PREFACE

The glorious achievements attained by Commodore Perry in the War of 1812 form an ever attractive subject for the student of American national history. The battle on Lake Erie and its victorious issue alone sufficed to make his name immortal.

It is not the magnitude of this action that excites the interest of the present day reader—for compared with modern sea fights it dwindles almost into insignificance—but the fact that the battle of Put-in-Bay was the first naval engagement ever fought between an American flotilla and an evenly matched foreign—in this case an English—fleet, and the added fact that it resulted in the entire loss of the latter by surrender, an event unprecedented in the annals of British naval warfare.

Far-reaching, likewise, were the results of this famous victory. The supremacy of Great Britain upon the Great Lakes—a supremacy that provided the highest strategical position for frontier conquest and also a highway for the invading forces into the very heart of the young republic—was forever broken. And it is to be remembered that this feat was accomplished through the genius and executive ability of a young American only 27 years of age.

Commodore Perry was possessed of more than ordinary moral and intellectual qualities. He combined with an immovable firmness a high degree of courage and a wonderful self-possession which never left him under the most trying circumstances. The truth of this statement is borne out by that famous exploit of transferring his pennant from his wrecked flagship to another vessel in the very heat of battle, amidst the fire of the entire hostile fleet. This daring act was sufficient to make him celebrated.

As a successful organizer the fame of Commodore Perry will endure. At Erie, Pa., he set himself at the task of creating out of nothing a fleet whose duty it became to oppose the finished and seasoned armament of Great Britain. Shipwrights had to be brought from Rhode Island and New York and supplies and equipment from Pittsburgh—journeys requiring days and weeks and involving delays and annoyances innumerable. He was never daunted by difficulties; these he overcame by calm steadfastness of purpose and untiring industry. The complement of his fleet was scarcely 500 men of whom one-half were sailors made out of the Pennsylvania militia. Months of steady drilling evolved excellent artillerists from this crude material.

In his capacity of commander, Perry was ever alive to the necessity of maintaining a high standard of efficiency in ships, in officers, and in men. Small wonder that a man who combined all these exceptional qualifications was enabled to cope successfully with a veteran of the British navy enjoying the prestige of having seen long service under the illustrious Lord Nelson.

A faithful biography of Commodore Perry cannot fail to be a source of delight to every American reader who ought to be proud of such a countryman and of a navy on whose enduring records is transcribed such a brilliant victory as that of Lake Erie. This is the biography herein offered, written in 1840 by one who had direct access to original sources of information.

PREFACE TO THE 1840 EDITION

The following work was undertaken at the request of Doctor Grant Champlin Perry, the eldest son of Commodore Perry, who, perceiving in the Naval History of Mr. J. F. Cooper an attempt to diminish that admiration with which the people of the United States have been accustomed to regard the memory of Perry, with a view of raising the standing of his second in command in the battle on Lake Erie, was desirous that a full account should be published of his father's life and services. This request having been willingly assented to, he accordingly forwarded to the writer the papers of his father, consisting almost entirely of public correspondence and log-books of various cruises, of which, however, the series was incomplete, and a vast mass of documents relating to the battle of Lake Erie, the whole forming rather materials for writing the history of that event than the life of Commodore Perry. The writer has had no access, either directly or through extracts, to Perry's correspondence with his immediate family, which would have afforded not only great assistance in carrying on the thread of the narrative, but also a better insight than could be otherwise obtained into his thoughts, his feelings, and affections. While reverencing the motive which led to this sacred treasuring from the public eye of all that remains of such a husband and father, he cannot but regret, as his biographer, the want of access to such valuable sources of information.

Compelled to seek materials when he had believed that his only task would be to make use of those which, through a long series of years, had been collected, the writer addressed himself forthwith to the living friends and companions of Commodore Perry, and to others who could lend him assistance in his undertaking. He has been kindly and generously aided by most of those to whom he applied. To the sister of Commodore Perry, nearest his own age, he is indebted for materials used in detailing the incidents of his early life, and her own words have occasionally been incorporated in the narrative. To Lieutenant A. A. Harwood, of the Navy, a resident of the neighbourhood in which Commodore Perry was born, he is under great obligations for anecdotes of the commodore's early life, obtained among the companions of his youth, and for a description of the family homestead. From Commander Stephen Champlin and Mr. Thomas Brownell he has received personal explanations on various minor points relating to the Lake Erie squadron, concerning which the printed and written documents were obscure or silent. To Doctor Usher Parsons, of Providence, the only medical officer in the Lake Erie squadron who was able to perform duty during and immediately after the battle, and who was subsequently surgeon of the Java when under Perry's command, the writer has to acknowledge himself under great obligations for a variety of facts communicated in a series of interesting notes, and just and intelligent opinions with regard to the character, manners, and acquirements of Perry. He has also to acknowledge the valuable communication he has received from the Honourable John Chambers, of Kentucky, an aide-de-camp of General Harrison during the campaign of 1813, containing several interesting anecdotes of Perry, which, with little change of the language in which they were communicated, will be found incorporated in the narrative. In addition to the various facts illustrative of the battle of Lake Erie, and of Captain Elliott's course towards Commodore Perry, subsequent to his succeeding him in the command, obtained from the highly intelligent and interesting letters of Samuel Hambleton, Esq., purser of the Lawrence, to Commodore Perry, Mr. Hambleton has kindly placed at the writer's disposal all the letters of Commodore Perry to himself, during a long period of friendly correspondence; and has, moreover, obligingly favoured him with extracts from his journal when on Lake Erie, and readily answered the various questions addressed to him. From his intelligent friend, C. O. Handy, Esq., secretary of Commodore Perry when on board the Java, and subsequently purser of the John Adams on his last cruise, the writer has received the heartiest assistance and valuable critical aid in the prosecution of his undertaking.

The writer has made occasional use of the valuable life of Perry published in 1821, by the Honourable John M. Niles; also of the masterly and beautiful sketch on the same subject, from the pen of Mr. Washington Irving, in the Analectic Magazine, and of various other works tending to throw a light on the subject; he has also carefully consulted Niles's Register, and a few contemporary newspapers. With few exceptions, however, the present life is entirely written from original documents and materials collected expressly for the purpose, and the utmost care has been taken in the verification of the facts. With regard to the tone of the book, it has been unavoidably rendered more controversial than the taste of the writer would have dictated; but the assaults made by Captain Elliott against the character of Commodore Perry have been so notorious, and the attempts of Mr. Cooper to dignify this gentleman at Commodore Perry's expense so obvious, that the life of Perry would have been incomplete had the writer failed to make use of the ample materials before him to set the question between these two officers effectually at rest.

AMONG the noblest of a nation's possessions is the memory of her great men. In the lowest state of degradation to which a nation may be reduced by her own degenerate profligacy, or by external causes which she cannot control, the memory of her mighty dead serves to solace her regrets, and to stimulate the noblest of the living to imitate their example; to vindicate the fame and character of their country, and, haply, to restore its liberties. Greece, in the midst of all the humiliation to which she was reduced by her own degeneracy, or by the resistless energy and numbers of barbarian conquerors, urged on by religious fanaticism, could still exult in the recollection of her past history, despite her conquerors, glory in her nationality, and find, in the memory of her Leonidas, Epaminondas, and Alcibiades, inspiration to fire the minds and nerve the arms of a Marco Botzaris and a Canaris.

Should America be also fated to know her season of decay, to sink under misfortune, and behold the extinction of her liberties, she may yet exult in the cherished memory of her patriots of other times, and find, in the inspiration of their example, worthy imitators of a Washington, a Franklin, a Warren, a Decatur, and a Perry. Her sages may, well compare, for wisdom and virtue, with the wisest and most patriotic of other lands. Brief as is her history, and few as happily have been her wars, no country has produced heroes of a truer stamp. Among these, he whom we have last named lingers in the memory, surrounded with all the attributes that can adorn or give lustre to successful valour; with modesty, kindness, courtesy, chivalrous self-devotion, lively sympathies, and a generous humanity. To place the memory of Perry before his countrymen in a more complete and enduring form, to show him in his real character, to depict his virtues without concealing his faults, is the object of the following narrative.

Edmund Perry, the paternal ancestor of Oliver Hazard Perry in the fifth generation, and the first who emigrated to this country, was born in Devonshire, in England, about the year 1630. He was a gentleman of education and of considerable literary attainments. Being an influential member, of the Society of Friends, and one of its public speakers, he became the subject of the persecution so rife during the domination of Cromwell, especially against the Quakers, who, tampering with the army and preaching universal peace, seduced the military zealots from their duty, and bade fair thus to put an end to the dominion of the saints. This led to the emigration of Edmund Perry to Plymouth, in Massachusetts, about thirty years subsequent to the foundation of that colony.

The persecution, however, which had driven him from England, raged with equal inveteracy in the colony in which he had taken refuge, though founded by those who had fled, like himself, in search of religious liberty. In order to be able to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience, he was compelled to remove farther from the haunts of civilized man; and at length, with others of his persuasion, found a resting-place in South Kingston, on the waters of Narragansett Bay, where they form their junction with Long Island Sound and the Atlantic, encircling the beautiful promontory which is also called by the name of Narragansett.

A more tolerant spirit existed in the colony of Rhode Island than its neighbor of Massachusetts Bay, by the persecuted of which it was chiefly settled. At any rate, there were none but Indians to disturb the emigrant in the possession of an estate which had been amicably acquired by purchase, and which continued in possession of the family at the birth of the subject of this narrative. The treatment of the Indians in this settlement was kind and conciliatory. Their descendants still continue to exist there in a civilized state; and it may be here mentioned as a remarkable fact, that one of them fell on Lake Erie on board the Lawrence.

Freeman Perry, great-grandson of Edmund Perry, and grandfather of Oliver Hazard Perry, was born on the second of February, 1732, and at the age of twenty-four married the daughter of Oliver Hazard, a descendant of one of the original Quaker settlers of Narragansett, whose brother held the station of lieutenant-governor of the colony. Oliver Hazard was a gentleman of large property, elegant manners, and cultivated tastes. The state of society in Rhode Island in those time not a little resembled that of Virginia. The cultivation of the soil was then performed by slaves, and commerce had introduced wealth, with its consequent luxuries and refinements. Freeman Perry was educated to the legal profession, in which he acquired distinction, filling, in a creditable manner, various offices of trust, such as member of the colonial Assembly, and judge of the court of Common Pleas.

The third son of this gentleman, called Christopher Raymond, father of the subject of this biography, was born on the fourth of December, 1761. Notwithstanding his early age when the revolution broke out, he was engaged throughout nearly the whole of the war in fighting the battles of his country, both by sea and land. After serving for a time in a corps of volunteers raised in Narragansett, called the Kingston Reds, he entered before the mast in a privateer commanded by a Captain Reed, and, on the termination of the cruise, made a second in the Mifflin, commanded by George Wait Babcock. In the course of this last cruise he was captured and taken into New-York, where he was confined for three months on board the Jersey prisonship, subject to many miseries, occasioned by the disproportionate numbers that were crowded together in a small space, the loathsome filth in which they existed, the unwholesomeness and insufficiency of the food, and all the studied barbarities by which Britons sought to punish their fellow-subjects of the New World for cherishing the love of freedom, and defending the liberties which were part of their birthright as descendants of Englishmen. Near the Wallabout, in Brooklyn, is a monument, erected over the remains of ten thousand Americans, victims of the systematic cruelty of British prison-ships.

Christopher Raymond Perry was among the small number of those who escaped to recount the horrible story of British captivity on board the Jersey. He came forth, however, the emaciated victim of the contagion which reigned within that abode of horror. But his zeal in behalf of liberty, and his resentment against England, were only quickened into fresh intensity by the treatment which he had received. So soon as his health was restored, he entered on board the U. S. ship Trumbull, commanded by Captain James Nicholson, and was on board that ship during her memorable combat with the Watt, a British letter of marque of greatly superior force. After an action of two hours and a half, during which the Trumbull had thirty-nine men killed and wounded, the English ship almost entirely ceased firing, and gave indications of an intention to surrender. Unfortunately, at this conjuncture, the topmasts of the Trumbull, which were badly wounded by the enemy's lofty firing, went over the side, when the latter, having lost no fewer than ninety-two men in killed and wounded, was happy to escape. This action was considered one of the severest of the Revolution.

Subsequently to this cruise, young Perry entered on board a privateer, bound on a cruise on the enemy's own coast. He was, however, again captured, and confined in prison in Ireland during eighteen months, at the end of which time he effected his escape; and, having passed in a British vessel to the island of St. Thomas in the character of a British seaman, took passage from thence to Charleston, where he arrived after the conclusion of the war in 1783.

Perry continued to devote himself to the profession of the sea, and made a voyage to Ireland as mate of a merchantman. Among the passengers on the return voyage to the port of Philadelphia was a lady, born in Ireland, but of Scotch extraction, by the name of Sarah

Alexander. The acquaintance thus begun on the ocean subsequently ripened into a strong attachment, and a year after, being in October, 1784, Christopher Raymond having risen to command, though as yet only twenty-three years of age, he found himself in a situation to marry; and, having previously had the fortune to win the consent of Miss Alexander, they were married in Philadelphia. They forthwith removed to South Kingston, where the young and uncommonly handsome couple was received with joyous celebrations by Perry's extensive family circle, and particularly by his maternal grandfather, the venerable Oliver Hazard, whose courteous and graceful demeanor impressed the bride most favourably as to the associates among whom her lot was now cast so far from her home.

The young couple became domesticated with Judge Perry, the captain's father, who resided on a farm of near two hundred acres, which had been in possession of his family since the settlement of the country. The old homestead stood at the base of a hill, which commanded an extensive view of the surrounding country, interspersed in many directions by picturesque lakes— one of them, called Point Judith Pond, being beautifully dotted by green islands—and bounded, by the irregular winding of the coast, with the waters of Narragansett, separating it from the opposite shores of Rhode Island, while far in the southern distance spread the broad Atlantic. The old post road between New-York and Boston, which, in the earlier days of the colonies, followed the circuitous line of the coast, out of the reach of Indian depredations passed at a short distance in front of the house; while in a picturesque and retired nook near an adjoining wood stood the family burying-ground, within which several generations had already been interred. Ere Captain Perry again resumed his profession, making voyages to many lands, the young couple continued for a season in this pleasing retirement, to enjoy together the sweets of domestic happiness. As the mother's character so sensibly affects that of the children, it may not be amiss here to say that Mrs. Perry was exceedingly intelligent and well-informed, and that, to a considerable share of personal attraction and a persuasive gentleness of demeanor, she added a degree of force of mind and energy of character not often found in her own sex, and seldom equalled in ours.

Their first child, Oliver Hazard Perry, was born on the twenty-third of August, 1785. His great-grandfather, Oliver Hazard, having died shortly before the birth of this child, and his uncle, Oliver Hazard Perry, being lost at sea on his passage from South Carolina about the same time, the boy was, at the request of his grandmother, named after her father and son thus simultaneously removed. The chief characteristics of Oliver's early years were an uncommon share of beauty, a sweetness and gentleness of disposition which corroborated the expression of his countenance, and a perfect disregard of danger, amounting to apparent unconsciousness. An anecdote illustrative of this peculiarity is still preserved in the family. When little more than two years old, Oliver had strayed into the road in company with an older child, and seated himself in the middle of it, when a horseman being discovered approaching, his companion jumped up and removed out of the way, calling to Oliver to do the same. He, however, sat still until the horseman approached, and drew up immediately over him, when, looking up calmly into his face, he lisped to him, "Man! you will not ride over me, will you?" The horseman, happening to be a friend of the family, dismounted, and carried the boy into the house, where he related the story with great interest, and much the same pride as if it had been his own child. He thought Oliver's conduct gave token of a confiding as well as a thoroughly courageous disposition.

Another anecdote, indicative of the same courage and of generous sympathy, was frequently related by his mother. When about five years old, he was sitting studying his lesson in the same room in which his father was busy with some accounts and papers. His sister, who was two years younger than himself, was playing about the floor, and, having found a paper which had fallen, had torn it into pieces, and turned her attention, according to the custom of young ladies of that age, to some new mischief. Presently the paper was missed, and the two children directed to search for it. Oliver soon found the fragments and handed them to his father; the delinquency of the little girl was manifest in her shamefaced air. The paper happened to be of importance, and the father, in the irritation of the moment, lifted his hand to inflict some trifling punishment, when Oliver placed himself between, and, passing one arm round his little sister, raised the other to intercept the blow, saying, at the same time, in a firm, yet deprecating and respectful tone, "Oh, papa! don't strike her!" His mother often spoke of his manner of performing this little act as indescribable; at the same time so protecting and kind towards his sister, and so firm, so earnest, yet so respectful towards his father. Captain Perry was completely disarmed of his resentment, and overcome by the words and manner of the child; for he was a man of susceptible and generous feelings. The little mischief-maker was received into favour; her affectionate confidence in her brother was not diminished by his conduct on this occasion; and his parents ever after freely intrusted her, as well as their other children, to his guidance and protection. The anecdote is interesting, as showing that his character in boyhood and maturer years was consistent with itself, and the qualities of courage and generosity were as fully displayed within the narrow circle of his secluded home as when under the broad gaze of an admiring world.

Soon after this incident, Oliver, having already learned to read under the tuition of his mother, was removed to a school established by one of the neighbours; for, the benefit of the rising generation. The increasing family and growing cares of Mrs. Perry rendered this relief desirable. The school was a sort of voluntary association, established without fee or gratuity by a benevolent bachelor of the neighbourhood, of considerable acquirements, though more noted for his goodness of heart and childlike simplicity. This old gentleman was as indolent as he was kind-hearted. He had often been importuned to open a school for the education of the children of the neighbourhood, and at length consented to do so on condition that he should be allowed to have his bed in the schoolroom. This being granted, the old gentleman reclined in state among his pupils, being assisted in his instructions, and in such little offices of flagellation as were indispensable, by his nephew, the present Judge William Peckham, of South Kingston, by whom the anecdote is related. Young Peckham's delegated dignity, however, was attended with this disadvantage, that, being nearest his uncle's bed, whenever the old gentleman felt an impulse to inflict punishment himself, his nephew, being nearest, usually had the benefit of it. As the school was at some distance, Oliver, with several female cousins of his own name, who lived on the adjoining farm, made their daily pilgrimage together. His little cousins had no brother, and were therefore glad to accept the protection of Oliver, who, though less in years than themselves, so threw himself between them and danger in all adventures on the road as to inspire a confidence in his manliness which was always justified. He seems, indeed, from his earliest youth, to have exercised an influence over those who approached him; this fact is attested by all the surviving companions of his youth. While his extraordinary beauty attracted attention to his person, it was soon converted into affectionate regard and respect by the graceful amenity of his manners, by a modesty which had in it nothing of shamefaced awkwardness, and by a display of quiet firmness and calm self-composure. The distinction which he subsequently acquired, while it gratified many of the friends of his youth even to tears, excited no astonishment; it seemed but the realization of those just hopes which his youth had inspired.

At Tower Hill, distant four miles from Judge Perry's farm, there was an excellent school, kept by a venerable Scotchman of the name of Kelly; "old Master Kelly," as he might well be called, as he had already taught three generations of that vicinage, and was now busy in dinning the same instruction into the fourth. Thither Oliver was despatched so soon as his age qualified him for the walk, and his female cousins became again the companions of his daily journeys, and subject to his protection. It is recorded of this worthy and time-honoured pedagogue, that, during the whole of his long servitude at Tower Hill, he had never once been known to lose his temper, but ever preserved a blessed equanimity, to be envied by all of his arduous and important calling. During Oliver's continuance at the school, old Master Kelly -was obliged to retire from sheer superannuation, and was succeeded by a Mr. Southworth, from Connecticut. This gentleman is represented to have been also an excellent teacher, and to have possessed a happy faculty of attaching his scholars. Both Oliver and his cousins were accustomed afterward to speak of the time they were under his tuition as the happiest of their school-days, and to recount with lively pleasure the recollections of their wayside adventures in their daily rambles. To this early association with his female cousins he was doubtless indebted for his peculiar gentleness of manners, and to a preference of female society to that of his own sex, which characterized him through life.

At the end of a year or two Mr. Southworth removed from the neighbourhood, and Doctor Perry fortunately procured the services of a Scotch gentleman of education and talents, who had recently been in the family of the governor, residing with him as tutor to his children. Oliver also had the benefit of his instructions, and became a temporary inmate of his uncle's family. Mr. Bryer proved not only an admirable instructor to the children, but an agreeable and entertaining companion. Unfortunately, at the end of a few months, he gave evidence of a failing which had caused the loss of a considerable fortune and his ruin in his own country, namely, an excessive fondness for the bottle. To be sure, he had the grace to absent himself from home during his periodical fits of intemperance; but, as the education of the children was thus interrupted, and as he was not rendered more clear-headed or more agreeable on his return, it became necessary to relinquish his services.

Meantime, Oliver's father had long since resumed the prosecution of his profession, and made many voyages, as commander and supercargo of merchant ships, to Europe, South America, and the East Indies. By these he became in possession of a handsome income. Desiring to secure for his children, amounting now to four, a better education than South Kingston afforded, and to promote his professional convenience, he established his family in Newport, about the time that the private school at Doctor Perry's was broken up by the misadventures of Mr. Bryer. Here Oliver was placed at the school of Mr. Frazer, under whose skilful and judicious tuition he made rapid proficiency in all his studies. The relaxed discipline of the country schools, where, the numbers being small, everything was conducted somewhat upon the principle of brotherly love, furnished but an imperfect preparation for the sterner rule which the Highland gentleman found it necessary to exercise among his more numerous and heterogeneous disciples at Newport. The early days of Oliver's admission into Mr. Frazer's school were signalized by a very untoward occurrence; no less a one than his receiving a broken head one day for some trifling and perhaps unconscious misdemeanor, from a heavy ferule<sup>1</sup> hurled by Mr. Frazer in an ungovernable fit of passion, such as he was often subject to. Seizing his hat, without leave asked or granted, Oliver went immediately home, and told his mother he could never enter that school again.

Mrs. Perry was a woman of strong feelings, eminently courageous temperament, and commanding character. She was necessarily indignant at the treatment of her child; but she was not much edified by Oliver's determinations as to what he would or would not do, nor disposed to yield to them. She did not reply to his decision not to return to Mr. Frazer's school, but quietly bound up his wounded head, and soothed him with expressions of maternal solicitude. Had she consulted only her resentment, it would have led her, at every hazard, to withdraw her child from the authority of one who had abused it. She wisely reflected, however, that Oliver, being an unusually high-spirited boy, and his father generally absent, as he happened to be at that time, if she yielded to his wishes in this instance, he might expect the same indulgence whenever he felt discontented with a school from motives less well-founded. This would not only be a disadvantage to him with regard to his studies, but might tend to weaken her own control over him. She therefore wrote a note to Mr. Frazer, stating, in subdued terms, her indignant feelings at the outrage upon her child, coupled with the motives which restrained her from withdrawing him from the school, and concluding by the expression of a hope that she should not have cause to regret the mark of renewed confidence which she thus gave to Mr. Frazer, by again intrusting her son to him. On the following morning, as the usual hour came round, she called to Oliver, as if she had heard nothing of his declaration of the previous day, and told him it was school-time. At the same time, she placed the note for Mr. Frazer into his hand, and told him that she did not think he would receive similar treatment again. The proud boy's lip quivered, and a tear stood in his eye; but the thought of disobeying his mother had never entered his head, nor did it probably ever do so until the day of his death. She lived to rear five sons, all of whom entered the naval service of their country, and whom she fitted to command others by teaching them thus early to obey.

Mr. Frazer was conscious of his own culpable violence, and alive to the good sense and magnanimity of Mrs. Perry's conduct. He devoted himself unremittingly to Oliver's improvement, became warmly attached to him, and won his attachment in return; for Oliver, though high-tempered, was a stranger to vindictiveness and cherished resentment. Newport was then an eminently commercial port. As many of the young men were intended for the sea, Mr.

Frazer had an evening class for the purpose of teaching mathematics, and their application to navigation and nautical astronomy. He took a peculiar pleasure in initiating Oliver into these sciences; and in the intervals between school-hours, and on holydays, would frequently walk to the beach with him, where a horizon could be obtained to take astronomic observations, and otherwise render his lessons more practical. Before Oliver left Mr. Frazer's school, the latter was wont to boast that he was the best navigator in Rhode Island.

In Newport Oliver attracted to himself no less attention and goodwill than among the partial friends of his childhood in South Kingston. His personal beauty, his modesty, and the mature and gentle gracefulness of his manners, won for him many friends. Among the number was Count Rochambeau, son of the distinguished general of that name, who commanded the French auxiliary army during our revolutionary war. This nobleman, being driven from his country by the terrors of the Revolution, had established himself at Newport, where his father's previous residence prepared for him many friends. Newport offered, moreover, many attractions to a person of refinement. Many of the inhabitants were wealthy and highly educated, and the tone of society was elegant and intellectual. Oliver's pleasing manners attracted the attention of the count, and his amiability and worth soon converted the feeling of partiality into a sincere friendship. Notwithstanding the boy's youth, he frequently invited him to dine in company with older friends, and, when he left Newport, presented him with a beautiful little watch as a token of his regard.

When Oliver was but eleven years old, Bishop Seabury came to Newport, in the course of an episcopal visitation of the Eastern states, for the purpose of ordaining clergymen and confirming the young, Oliver's parents scarcely considered him old enough to receive and appreciate that solemn rite; but the bishop, having been greatly pleased by his appearance and manners; and by the maturity and seriousness which his conversation indicated, requested that he might come forward for confirmation. Afterward, when the bishop came to take leave of Oliver's parents, he laid his hands upon the boy's head, and blessed him in a manner so solemn and emphatic as to make an indelible impression upon all who were present. His mother was greatly touched by the incident, and received the impression that the blessing had been heard and answered, and would follow him through life.

Towards the close of the year 1797, Captain Perry, having secured a small competency, retired from his profession, and settled in the village of Westerly, in a remote part of the state. Oliver was now entering his thirteenth year; his education was unusually advanced for his age, for he had been a diligent student at Mr. Frazer's during the last five years; and an unbounded fondness for books, kept up from the early period when his mother had first taught him to read, had imparted to him an unusual share of general information. Fortunately for the youth of those times, novels were not so abundant nor so universally diffused as now, and the reading of Oliver was confined to Plutarch, Shakspeare, the Spectator,<sup>2</sup> and works of a similar character, suited to instruct and furnish the mind, and give force to the character.

About this period, our relations with the French republic were beginning to assume a hostile character. That ambitious and unprincipled government having expected to receive active assistance from us in her war against England, under a false construction of the alliance entered into during our war of independence, was provoked by our cautious neutrality. Deluded by the friendship of an extravagant and intemperate faction in the United States, who justified all the horrors of the French Revolution, into the belief that the great body of the American people was in their favour, the French sought to involve us in the war as their allies, by infringing our neutrality and complicating our relations with England. Citizen Genet, the French representative in the United States, not only undertook to grant commissions and fit out privateers in the United States to cruise against British commerce, but actually succeeded in sending some vessels to sea in defiance of our government. These, moreover, captured British vessels on our own coasts, and even within our navigable waters. Not content with this measure of aggression, insult, and contumely, the French cruisers and privateers soon after began to capture our own merchant vessels.

Every attempt to obtain redress from the French government for these aggravated grievances having failed, Congress so far adopted the recommendation of the president for an enlarged plan of naval defense as to authorize him, in April, 1798, to purchase, hire, or build twelve ships, of not more than twenty guns each, to be added to the six frigates which then constituted our navy, and three of which only, namely, the United States, the Constitution, and Constellation, were already launched. At the same time, a separate department of the government was created, to superintend the affairs of the navy, which had hitherto been under the control of the war department; and Benjamin Stoddert was subsequently created the first secretary of the navy under the Federal Constitution. Soon after, the president was authorized to purchase twelve additional ships, of from eighteen to thirty-two guns, and to instruct the commanders of our ships of war to capture any French cruisers, whether men-of-war or privateers, that might be found upon our coasts, having committed, or being likely, as there might be reason to believe, to commit any depredations on our commerce; also, to recapture any American vessels that might have been already seized. Laws were subsequently passed for the capture of French cruisers wherever they might be found, and for the condemnation of the prizes that might thus be made. Such was the origin of the quasi war with France, more familiarly known as the French disturbances.

The prospect of a naval contest with a nation which had so insultingly trampled on our commercial rights, and the recollection of his youthful enterprises on the ocean in the revolutionary war, prompted Captain Perry to seek employment in the marine about to be created. Strong applications in his behalf, from the most influential persons in Rhode Island, were forwarded to the president, and he was at once commissioned a post-captain in the navy. On the ninth day of June, 1798, two days after the date of the commission, instructions were transmitted by Oliver Wolcott, the secretary of the treasury, to Mr. George Champlin, of Newport, directing him to procure such a ship as Captain Perry should approve of. No suitable ship could be found, and the construction of one was immediately commenced at the town of Warren, near Bristol in Rhode Island, in which neighbourhood ship-timber abounded. Thither Captain Perry at once removed, to attend to the construction of the ship, which it had been determined to name after General Greene, the most distinguished of the sons of Rhode Island.

Meantime, Mrs. Perry having accompanied her husband to Warren, Oliver, then not quite thirteen years old, remained in complete charge of the family, making all the necessary purchases, attending that his sister and younger brothers went regularly to school, keeping his parents constantly advised by letter of all that was passing, and conducting the whole affairs of the family with prudence and regularity. The obedience which he received from his younger brothers and from all the household was unquestioning and unqualified. With all this early influence over others, Oliver was still, however, a boy, with all the tastes of one, except that he had little propensity to mischief. Among his favourite amusements of this period was sailing boats and planks in the Pawcatuck river, which made an elbow quite near the house. Mr. T. S. Taylor, now of South Kingston, was his schoolfellow and playmate in Westerly; and, in bearing recent testimony to the good temper and kind feelings which characterized Oliver, and rendered him a universal favourite, states, that the only occasion on which he ever saw him angry was in one of their sailing excursions in the shoal water of the Pawcatuck, when the boys were representing a sea engagement; and Oliver's raft happening to be run down by that of young Taylor, who was the opposing admiral, Oliver's rage became ungovernable, and he was for a moment anxious to resort to any means, however foreign to the prescribed warfare, to recover the lost advantage of the day. Among his habitual playmates were his next brother Raymond and his cousin, George Perry, who, being a resident of the family and part of his garrison, joined daily in a game of ball before the house, into the spirit of which Oliver entered with all his soul, and with conspicuous activity, to the delight of his sisters, by one of whom the anecdote is related, to show that he had the tastes of his age, and that the control which he so early exercised over others was not owing to any undue assumption of manhood, but to his calmness, gentleness, and habits of self-command.

Amid this blending of manly and boyish occupations, Oliver was meditating seriously the plan of his future life. He had early imbibed a desire for the military profession, from the conversation of his mother. The friends of this lady, though Protestants and of

Scotch descent, had been involved in the Irish rebellion. She herself had felt a lively enthusiasm in the cause of liberty, and had listened, with deep interest, to every account she had heard of battles and skirmishes in the neighbourhood. She took a pleasure in recounting to her son the achievements of her countrymen and always insisted that they were the bravest people in the world. These narratives had fired the mind of Oliver, and created a desire in him to pursue the profession of arms. He had been born almost on the shore of the Atlantic, and with water and ships perpetually in sight. His residence in Newport, too, and the occupations of his father, had brought him much in connexion with ships and seamen, and blended with his inclination for a military life a desire to make his home upon the sea. When, therefore, hostilities with France became inevitable, and his father received his commission as a post-captain in the navy, and was appointed to the General Greene, the means of gratifying his double tastes for war and for the sea were at once provided. He wrote to his father, asking his leave to enter the navy; and, being requested to state the motives which influenced him in his choice he did so in detail and at considerable length. Mr. Thomas Hazard, a relation of Captain Perry, who is still living, happened to be present at Warren when this letter was received. It was handed to him to read; and the good reasons that were given for the choice, and the mature, sensible, and manly terms in which they were expressed, made an impression which is not yet effaced from the mind of the old gentleman. It is much to be regretted, that in the various removals and vicissitudes of the family, this letter, with almost every other relating to the youth of Perry, has disappeared. It would be of no little interest to examine how far the motives with which he entered upon his profession were borne out by the results, and to compare his hopes with their after fulfilment. We should no doubt find in the comparison a rare example of a cloud castle excelled by the splendour of the real structure, and youthful aspirations for glory outdone by the reality.

CAPTAIN PERRY had commenced the building of the General Greene immediately after receiving his commission, but it was not until the spring of the following year that the ship was ready to proceed to sea. She was a small frigate, rated at twenty-eight, and mounting probably thirty-six guns.<sup>1</sup> The officers were chiefly appointed from Rhode Island, and the selection of them was intrusted by the secretary of the navy to Captain Perry. When, therefore, he had received Oliver's letter, assigning reasons for his wish to enter the navy, and had determined, with the consent of Mrs. Perry, to accede to it, there was no farther difficulty to be encountered. Oliver's name was placed on the list of those recommended to fill the stations of midshipmen on board the General Greene, and in April, 1799, he received his warrant and orders to report for duty. Bidding adieu to his home and the companions of his childhood, he embarked with his father, and soon after sailed for the island of Cuba. It was in the West India seas that the French cruisers most abounded, and that our commerce suffered most from their depredations. The ship was engaged for several weeks in giving convoy to our merchant vessels bound from Havana to the United States. The yellow fever having, however, broken out among her crew, compelled Captain Perry to abandon his station in order to check the progress of the disease. He proceeded, accordingly, to Newport, and arrived there towards the close of July.

On the departure of Captain Perry from home, he had removed his family from Westerly to Tower Hill, in order that Mrs. Perry might be within reach of the friendly offices of his relations. Thither Oliver accompanied his father, and he remained chiefly at home during the period employed in refitting the ship and restoring the health of her crew. He was, of course, a person of great consequence, on his return from foreign parts, in the eyes of his younger brothers and sisters. They used to go forth betimes in the morning to pick berries for his breakfast, before the dew had been drunk up by the early sun, and followed him in all his rambles with untiring affection, and with a certain respectful deference, which was perhaps now a little enhanced by their awe of his uniform. During his absence he had commenced learning to perform on the flute, an accomplishment in some degree or other universal among midshipmen, but which he afterward carried to very great perfection. His childish companions were, however, anything but fastidious critics; and, in their sylvan rambles, the simple melodies which he drew forth appeared to them altogether charming.

The health of the crew of the General Greene having been completely restored, she resumed her station off Havana early in the autumn, and continued to give convoy to our vessels bound through the Bahama Channel or into the Gulf of Mexico. The disturbed condition of St. Domingo, and the piracies committed on our commerce by the followers of Rigaud, a mulatto chieftain who aimed at establishing a rival power independent of Toussaint, occasioned the General Greene to be soon after ordered to that island. She was placed under the orders of Commodore Talbot, who was about to be despatched there in the Constitution, and who directed Captain Perry to proceed at once to the station and circumnavigate the island, with a view to the more extensive protection of our commerce.

The General Greene arrived at Cape Francois early in October, when Captain Perry received a communication from Mr. Edward Stevens, at that time our consul-general in St. Domingo, informing him of the state of affairs in the island, and pointing out the line of conduct necessary for the protection of our commerce. In the prosecution of the civil war then raging in the island, between General Toussaint L'Ouverture, who commanded the armies operating under the name of the French Republic, but in reality controlled only by himself, and General Rigaud, the former had signalized himself by a friendly course towards neutral powers, and a studious regard to the laws of hospitality with respect to the merchant vessels visiting the ports within his control. Rigaud, on the contrary, carried on, through his armed barges, a predatory warfare, not merely on the vessels of the island belonging to the ports under the jurisdiction of Toussaint, but also on all neutral vessels approaching the coast. On this account, it became the policy of neutrals to protect and encourage General Toussaint, whose upright and honourable character inspired unbounded confidence, and oppose Rigaud. With this view the American and English consuls joined in granting passports to the cruisers fitted out by Toussaint, which, though wearing the French flag and owning the French allegiance, were exempted from capture, to which other French vessels were subject.<sup>2</sup> The government of the United States had approved of the course adopted by their consul, and Captain Perry was ordered not to capture or molest any of the vessels fitted out by Toussaint for the purpose of defending his coasts against the barges of Rigaud, so long as they should continue to respect the commerce of the United States, but to render what aid he was able in putting down Rigaud. While cruising in the neighbourhood of Cape Tiburon, on the ninth of February, 1800, Captain Perry discovered a number of Rigaud's cruisers anchored under protection of three forts on the coast. He immediately stood in and anchored under the forts, which, in less than thirty minutes, were silenced, with the loss of a number killed on the part of the enemy; the General Greene having only received a few shots in her hull, and some trifling injury in her rigging. The boats of the General Greene were speedily got out, in readiness to take possession of the vessels at anchor, when, a large ship being seen in the offing which had the appearance of a French frigate, it became necessary to get the ship under way, in order to avoid being placed between two fires. Chase was given to the strange sail, which proved to be a captured French vessel in the service of England.

Soon after this occurrence, Captain Perry received an urgent request from General Toussaint that he would proceed with the General Greene off the port of Jaquemel, which he was then besieging. As this was the stronghold of Rigaud, from which he despatched his cruisers and into which they brought their prizes, Captain Perry readily complied with the request. He proceeded off the port, and not only so strictly blockaded it as to intercept the entry of supplies and produce a great scarcity, but took part in the active operations of the siege. The fire of the General Greene compelled the enemy at length to evacuate their strongest position, and led to the surrender of the garrison, consisting of five thousand men. The reduction of this place, from which the commerce of the United States had been seriously annoyed, and which was considered at home of great importance, was attributed by General Toussaint entirely to Captain Perry's co-operation. He returned him sincere and repeated thanks for his assistance, assured him of the lively gratitude he should ever feel to him and his country, and of his firm determination to extend his friendship and protection, on all occasions, to the citizens of the United States; a determination which he ever most faithfully observed.

After the fall of Jaquemel, Captain Perry prosecuted the cruise which he had been ordered to make round the island of St. Domingo, which terminated early in April at Cape Francois, the port from which he had set out. Here he fell in with Commodore Talbot in the Constitution frigate, and was much annoyed by the commodore's taking from him twenty-four of his best men, and sending seventeen invalids to supply their places. Captain Perry made the conduct of the commodore the subject of complaint in his report to the secretary of the navy. He argued forcibly against the unfairness of ridding one ship of disease at the expense of another; and expressed the belief, that the removal of so many of his crew from the ship for which they had entered would have an injurious effect on the recruiting service in Rhode Island. He stated that many of his crew had families, or were the sons of substantial farmers, whose connexions looked to him for their safe return, and that, should any accident happen to them from their being turned over to another ship, or discharged at a distance from their homes, it would not only give ground of complaint against the commander, but excite clamour and prejudice against the navy. The fact is interesting, as showing, at this early period in the existence of our navy, the want of a higher grade of officers to command in chief, with a fairness which can never be expected from one who is at the same time captain of a particular ship, and also as giving an insight into the composition of our crews.

An order had been received from the secretary of the navy for the General Greene to proceed off the mouth of the Mississippi, in order to receive on board General Wilkinson and family, and transport them to a northern port of the United States. By direction of Commodore Talbot, the General Greene now sailed on this service, and arrived off the Balize<sup>3</sup> about the twentieth of April. After a delay of several weeks, she sailed for Newport on the tenth of May, giving convoy by the way to an American brig bound to Havana. When off that port she fell in with a British line-of-battle ship, which, when near, fired a shot at the merchant brig to bring her to. The brig, in obedience to the orders of Captain Perry, paid no regard to the signal from the British ship, but continued her course. As the wind was light, the British captain despatched a boat to board the brig; but, as the boat approached, Captain Perry fired a shot ahead of her. This brought the boat alongside of the General Greene, and the line-of-battle ship at the same time bore down, and, when within hail her captain demanded why his boat had been fired on. Captain Perry replied, that it was to prevent her from boarding the American brig, which was under his convoy and protection. The British captain rejoined that it was very strange that one of his majesty's seventy-four gun ships could not board an American merchant brig. Captain Perry replied, "If she were a first-rate ship, she should not do so to the dishonour of my flag!" This memorable answer embraces the whole principle and profession of naval honour. It was worthy of Captain Perry, of his country, and of the future reputation of his son.

The foregoing incident would show that the school was a good one in which young Perry received his first lessons of naval honour. He made rapid progress in the attainment of professional knowledge, improved himself by diligent reading, and, as opportunity occurred, by intercourse with society; and, while preserving a dignity of deportment beyond his years, by his gentleness and amiability won the affectionate attachment of all around him. His earliest letter which has been preserved, and the only one of this period extant, is now before the writer. It is brief, sententious, and well expressed; exhibits a strong attachment to his brothers and sisters, a respectful affection to his mother, to whom it is addressed, and a lively solicitude for her welfare.

On the arrival of the General Greene at Newport, towards the close of May, orders were received from the secretary of the navy to pay off the whole of her crew, except such a small number as might be necessary to take care of the ship while she was undergoing repairs. She was ordered to be prepared for sea with all possible despatch; and Captain Perry was directed to advise the secretary when the ship should be ready to receive her crew, that the necessary orders might be given for recruiting it. The secretary urged Captain Perry to hasten his preparations by the complimentary assurance that the services of the General Greene had been too important to be dispensed with a moment longer than might be necessary to re-equip her for sea.

Soon after, the negotiations for the settlement of our difficulties with France, which had been for some time going on at Paris, assumed an appearance of pacific termination. No farther measures were therefore taken to increase our naval force abroad, and the sailing of the General Greene was delayed, with that of other ships about to put to sea. Early in the following year, the treaty which had been agreed upon in Paris was ratified by the Senate of the United States; and, very soon after, a change of administration having occurred, which brought Mr. Jefferson into office, on principles opposed to the navy, and to expenditures for almost every liberal object connected with the permanent welfare of the country, it was determined to reduce the navy nearly to the condition in which our difficulties with France had found it. The cruisers of all rates were reduced in number, by selling the excess, from forty-two to thirteen, and the officers were discharged from the service in even greater proportions. Of forty-two post-captains who had abandoned their pursuits, and many of them sacrificed their fortune, to come forward in defense of their country's rights, only nine were retained in the navy. The masters' commandant were dismissed in mass.

Captain Perry was among the large majority excluded from the service; and the circumstance was not a little painful to him, though announced by the secretary of the navy in the following terms, as well suited as any other to sooth the annoyance inseparable from such a notification: "The act providing for the peace establishment of the navy of the United States has imposed on the president a painful duty. It directs him to select nine gentlemen from among the captains of the navy of the United States, and to permit the remaining commanders to retire from public service with the advance of four months' extra pay. I have deemed it a duty, therefore, as early as possible to inform you, that you will be among those whose services, however reluctantly, will be dispensed with. Permit me to assure you that the president has a just sense of the services rendered by you to your country, and that I am, with sentiments of respect, your most obedient servant."

Chance, which presided more at this reduction than judgment or discretion, so willed it that the reduction was much less thorough among the inferior classes of officers, and out of nearly three hundred and fifty midshipmen, upward of one hundred and fifty were retained to perform duty under the nine remaining captains. Fortunately for the honour of the country and the future reputation of its flag, the name of Oliver Perry figured among those of the midshipmen thus retained in the service.

Our difficulties with France were scarcely at an end, and our naval establishment reduced, before the unprotected state of our commerce created for us new enemies. In order to procure a suspension of the depredations on our commerce heretofore committed by the Barbary corsairs, our government had been guilty of the weakness of bribing the various regencies by an annual present of arms and other goods, and in some cases of money. On recent occasion, the Dey of Algiers had carried his insolence so far as to compel the commander of the American ship of war which had brought out the tribute to proceed to Constantinople with a present which he, in turn, was desirous of making to the sultan. Having thus consented to pay tribute to Algiers, and tamely suffered one of our national vessels to be impressed into the service of a barbarian chief, to be employed in the degrading task of carrying tribute to a third power—having also paid tribute to the Bey of Tunis, the Bashaw of Tripoli reasonably enough came to the conclusion that he was entitled to be treated with equal consideration, and determined, at any rate, to resort to similar means of extorting what he conceived to be his due. The custom of making presents and paying tribute had long been acquiesced in by the weak powers of the opposite continent, whose unprotected commerce covered the Mediterranean. The bashaw, after setting forth the various grievances that he had suffered from the United States, and especially the superior value of the presents which had been made to Algiers and Tunis, at length, towards the close of 1800, formally announced to the American consul, that if he did not receive a present in money from the United States within six months, he would commence hostilities against our commerce.

Our recent naval successes in the struggle against France had prepared the country to resist this insolent demand, and arrangements were forthwith commenced for refitting and recommissioning our dismantled ships. In the summer of 1801, Commodore Dale was despatched to the Mediterranean with the President, Philadelphia, and Essex frigates, and schooner Enterprise. Commodore Dale found that the bashaw, in fulfilment of his threat, had, at the expiration of the six months, caused the flagstaff of our consulate to be cut down, the symbol among those piratical regencies of a declaration of war. As Commodore Dale's orders restricted him to a defensive course, he confined his operations to blockading the Tripolitan cruisers in their own port, and in neutral ports where they happened to find them; thus the Tripolitan admiral having been found by the squadron with a ship and a brig in the Bay of Gibraltar, they were there blockaded by a part of the squadron. Only one encounter took place at sea during the cruise of this squadron, and this was most glorious for our arms. It was between the Enterprise, of twelve guns, commanded by Lieutenant Sterret, and the Tripoli, a ship of fourteen guns. The action continued for three hours, at the end of which time fifty of the corsair's crew were either killed or wounded out of eighty which composed her complement. The president being under the impression that the Constitution did not authorize him, in the prosecution of this defensive warfare, to make captures, had ordered that no vessels should be taken from the enemy, and the Tripoli was accordingly disarmed and set at liberty.

Early in 1802 laws were passed by Congress empowering the executive to make use of every means of reducing Tripoli to peace. The term of enlistment for seamen was judiciously extended from one to two years, and a more numerous squadron of ships was fitted out, to take the place of the one of which the term of service had now expired. This squadron consisted of the Chesapeake, Constellation, New-York, Adams, and John Adams frigates, and schooner Enterprise. It was commanded by Commodore Richard V. Morris. On board the Adams, commanded by Captain Hugh G. Campbell, Oliver Perry again embarked as midshipman, after a little more than a year that he had remained detached from active service. The Adams was lying in Newport, which circumstance probably fixed Oliver's destination to that particular ship, and laid the foundation of a sincere and lively friendship towards him on the part of Commodore Campbell, which ended only with the life of that valuable officer, whose name continues in the service to be the object of veneration.

The Adams sailed from Newport in June, and arrived at Gibraltar towards the middle of July. Here she fell in with the commodore, who had his flag on board the Chesapeake. The Adams, after having made a short cruise to Malaga with convoy, was left at Gibraltar to watch the two Tripolitan vessels in that harbour, and the commodore proceeded up the Mediterranean with the Chesapeake, New-York, John Adams, and Enterprise, having a number of merchant vessels under convoy, intending, after seeing them into the ports to which they were bound, to appear off Tripoli and commence his offensive operations. By the time, however, that he had reached Malta, the provisions of his squadron were getting short; and, on sailing for Tripoli, having encountered an adverse gale of many days' duration, he bore up, and, running down for Tunis, touched there and at Algiers, and subsequently reached Gibraltar again towards the close of March. At Gibraltar the commodore shifted his flag from the Chesapeake to the New-York, and the Chesapeake returned to the United States.

After so long and wearisome a detention at Gibraltar in blockading the Tripolitan cruiser—relieved, however, for Oliver by one redeeming circumstance, his promotion to an acting lieutenancy on his birthday, at the early age of seventeen—the Adams was now, to the great satisfaction of all on board of her, ordered to proceed up the Mediterranean with a convoy of ten sail, and subsequently to meet the commodore at Malta, from which place the whole squadron was to go to Tripoli, and active operations against the enemy were forthwith to commence. The ship touched at Malaga, Alicant, and Barcelona in Spain, and, after remaining a few days at the latter place, proceeded onward with the residue of her convoy to Leghorn and Naples. Young Perry seized with avidity the opportunity thus afforded him of seeing something of the cities which the Adams visited; and the indulgence of his captain, to whose partiality he had owed the pleasing circumstance of so agreeable a present on his last birthday, enabled him to make excursions to various interesting points in the neighbourhood of the ports at which they stopped, from which he derived both pleasure and advantage.

During the month of May, the squadron, consisting of the New-York, John Adams, Adams, and Enterprise, joined company at the rendezvous at Malta, and soon after sailed for Tripoli. In approaching that city, a number of merchant vessels were discovered making for the port, protected by a flotilla of gunboats. The squadron at once gave chase, and succeeded in cutting the vessels off from the port, but not in hindering them from getting into another small harbour adjoining to the city. The vessels, being small, were soon unladen and hauled up on the beach, and breastworks were at once thrown up to defend them, the wheat which composed their cargo being used for the purpose. A large stone building adjacent to the bank was hastily fortified and filled with soldiery. The gunboats, by the aid of their sweeps, had been able to escape along shore, and get within the mole under cover of the batteries. Lieutenant David Porter, then first lieutenant of the New-York, volunteered to go in with the boats of the squadron during the night and destroy the vessels on the beach. The commodore, while declining to accept his services for the night, as the darkness would prevent the co-operation of the ships, determined to attempt the enterprise on the following morning.

Accordingly, the boats were despatched with a strong force from all the ships. They pulled gallantly in under a heavy fire of musketry from the Moors and Arabs stationed behind the breastworks, and imperfectly sustained by the fire of the ships, on account of their distance from the shore. In defiance of the sharp fire of the enemy, our gallant seamen landed under their very breastworks, which were so near that the unarmed rabble collected behind the combatants assailed our men with stones, and succeeded in firing the vessels on the beach. They then returned to their boats, and pulled out through the midst of the enemy's fire to their ships. Although the vessels were in flames before our men left them, the Tripolitans succeeded in preserving most of them by great exertions. Twelve of our men were either killed or wounded, and the loss of the enemy was supposed to have been more considerable. Lieutenant Porter, who so gallantly led the enterprise, was among the wounded. It is not known that young Perry certainly took part in this daring exploit; but his rank as a young lieutenant on board one of the ships in the squadron, and the heroic spirit which ever characterized him, render it very unlikely that he should have been absent from this scene of danger and of glory.

Soon after, an effort was made to destroy the fleet of gunboats which were anchored at the entrance of the harbour, between the mole and a reef of rocks which formed the western side of the channel. On the morning fixed for the attack, a very light breeze prevailed, and only the John Adams, commanded by Captain J. Rodgers, was able to reach her station and engage the enemy. The gunboats retired from the fire of the John Adams behind the mole, and towards nightfall the ship withdrew into the offing. On the following day the commodore made an effort to arrange our difficulties by means of negotiations; but, as there had been nothing in the manner in which the war had hitherto been carried on to give these barbarians a very formidable idea of our naval power, the attempted negotiation was attended with no pacific result. Soon after the commodore sailed for Malta, leaving Captain Rodgers in the John Adams to prosecute the blockade, with the aid of Captain Campbell in the Adams, and Lieutenant Isaac Hull in the schooner Enterprise. Towards the close of June the John Adams had an engagement with an enemy's ship of twenty-two guns, which had left Tripoli in the night and attempted to escape the blockade; being discovered by the Enterprise, she was pursued into shoal water by the Enterprise and John Adams, and compelled to anchor near the shore, where parties of cavalry collected for her defense, and the fleet of gunboats also hastened from Tripoli to her assistance. After a spirited action, the battery of the corsair was silenced, and her crew jumped overboard and swam ashore. Preparations were making to get the boats out and take possession of the prize, when she blew up.

Shortly after this occurrence, the commodore, having received information of hostile operations against our commerce on the part of the Algerines and Tunisians, recalled all the ships from Tripoli and raised the blockade. He collected his squadron in Malta, from whence he made a visit to the Italian coast. After visiting Sicily, Naples, and several of the neighbouring ports, the John Adams was despatched with a convoy of American vessels down the Mediterranean, while the Adams cruised down on the Barbary side, touching at the various ports. On the reunion of the squadron again at Gibraltar, Commodore Morris found letters recalling him from his command, which temporarily devolved on Captain Rodgers, who hoisted his flag on board the New-York, in expectation of the speedy arrival of Commodore Edward Preble, who had been appointed to prosecute the war, and was daily looked for in the Constitution. Captain Campbell replaced Captain Rodgers on board the John Adams, while Commodore Morris proceeded in the Adams to the United States, where he arrived towards the close of November, 1803.

After an absence of a year and a half, young Perry returned again to his family, which he found established in Newport. He now devoted himself earnestly to the study of mathematics and astronomy, and the general improvement of his mind. His leisure hours were passed in the society of the intelligent and refined. Those who remember him at this period represent him as quick and excitable in his temper, but not disposed to unreasonable anger, nor implacable in his resentments. He was a faithful and generous friend, and ready to go any length to serve those to whom he was attached. He appeared exceedingly well in conversation, and the value of his judicious and well-timed remarks was enhanced by the modesty and absence of all pretension with which they were expressed. He was fond of the society of ladies, and his good looks and unusually graceful demeanor fitted him to appear most advantageously in it. To these social qualifications were added a fine taste for music, and an uncommonly skilful performance on the flute. It is remarked of him that few young men had so nice a sense of honour with regard to female character. He frowned indignantly on any who trifled with the affections of a lady, and his own deportment towards the sex was courteous, circumspect, and deferential. These elegant tastes naturally involved an aversion to dissipation generally. The only extravagance in which he indulged was occasioned by his fondness for horses, in one of the finest of which that he could meet with when on shore he usually invested his surplus pay. He had, indeed, been accustomed to horses from his childhood, and was a fearless and elegant rider. To this accomplishment he added, in our country, the more questionable one of playing an admirable game of billiards; but, as he never had any taste for gambling, his visits to the billiard-room were attended with no bad results. He is said to have fenced dexterously, and been generally skilful in the use of arms. Such was the character, tastes, and occupations of young Perry as he was verging from youth towards the season of manhood.

Prosecution of Tripolitan War under Preble.—Perry's anxiety to take part in it.—Equipment of four Frigates.—Perry ordered to the Constellation.—Joins her at Washington.—Mingles in Society.—Sails for the Mediterranean.—Preble superseded.—The War loses its chivalrous Character.—Expedition of General Eaton.—its partial Success.—Perry transferred to the Nautilus.—Commodore Rodgers succeeds to the Command.—Concludes Peace.—Visits Tunis.—Confirms the friendship of that Power.—The Nautilus visits Algiers.—A change of Administration in that Regency.—Visit to Gibraltar.—Perry removed to the Constitution.—His Character as an Officer.—Returns home in the Essex.—Description of him by a Shipmate.

PERRY was not destined to a long enjoyment of the tranquil occupations of his residence in Newport. The command of Commodore Preble in the Mediterranean had been distinguished by a more vigorous system of operations than that of any of his predecessors. The whole period of his presence before Tripoli had been signalized by a series of bombardments and boat-attacks, conceived in the highest spirit of naval enterprise, and executed with a brilliant daring which has never been surpassed. The boat attacks, planned and executed under the eye of Preble, and supported by the guns of the Constitution and the small vessels composing the little squadron, partook, indeed, of a character of heroism which call to mind the ancient struggles of Christians and Saracens in those same waters. The hand-to-hand struggling, the hair-breadth escapes, the brilliant self-devotion to succour or to save, all invest this short period of Preble's command with a chivalrous and heroic interest of the highest stamp.

It was the fortune of Perry to have been attached to the Mediterranean station both immediately before and immediately after the command of Commodore Preble. Had he been with him throughout the brilliant period of his service, he would have associated his name earlier than he eventually did with the glory of a Preble, a Decatur, and a Somers; he would either have covered himself with equal renown, or found, like some of the heroes of that war, an early grave.

Intelligence of the earliest achievements of Commodore Preble's command had led young Perry to weary of his present professional inactivity, though in itself not destitute for him of pleasure and improvement. He desired to be again in the Mediterranean; and the loss of the Philadelphia, which left the Constitution the only heavy ship before Tripoli, determined the government, which was more than ever resolved to prosecute this war to a successful issue, to fit out four additional frigates. The President, Congress, Constellation, and Essex were the ships selected, and, as there were only three captains in the service junior to Commodore Preble, it was most unwisely determined to supersede him in the command. The government might have escaped from the dilemma by making a single additional captain, or it might have deducted one ship from the number of its re-enforcement, so as to have left Preble in the command. It could not discover that the magic was in the individual. The predecessors of Preble had all the advantages that could be derived from the array of superior numbers. Preble had the true desire of glory; the power of adapting his means to the end; the cool, unbiased judgment, which could weigh the difficulties which presented themselves in his path, and justly estimate the chances of success.

The Constellation, one of the ships of the new squadron, was to be commanded by Captain H. G. Campbell. The partiality of Perry's old commander and friend readily induced him to procure Perry to be ordered to his ship as one of his lieutenants. The ship was fitted out at Washington. This was young Perry's first visit to that part of the country. In the intervals during which his professional duties permitted him to be absent from the ship, he visited, by invitation, several families of distinction in the neighbourhood, into which he was received with kindness and hospitality.

The intelligence, urbanity, frankness, and unaffected good-nature which he everywhere met with, impressed him most favourably towards the inhabitants, and from the earnestness with which his society was sought, the favourable impression was evidently mutual

His youth and uncommon share of good looks, enhanced by his intelligence and modesty, were qualities that would have made him circulate anywhere, and it is not to be wondered at that the handsome young officer was no less a favourite with the young ladies of the neighbourhood than with their discerning sires. His confidential letters of this period to his mother intimate the belief that, were he disposed to make his fortune by marriage, the chances for success would not be inconsiderable. His youth, however, he considered an objection to his taking upon himself so weighty an obligation.

Early in July the Constellation left Washington, and soon after proceeded to the Mediterranean. She arrived off Tripoli in September, in company with the President, bearing the broad pendant of Commodore S. Barron. As the Constellation remained on the station, Commodore Preble having returned home in the John Adams, which had arrived shortly before as a storeship, the force under the command of Commodore Barron, consisting of five frigates and five stout brigs, was the most formidable squadron which had ever been united under the command of an American officer. With a single frigate, and a few clumsy and ill-equipped gunboats, Commodore Preble had made repeated attacks on the forts, batteries, and flotilla. With the present force, the master-spirit of Preble, had it been intrusted with a prolonged command, would have quickly reduced Tripoli to ruins or unconditional submission. Nothing, however, beyond a blockade, which the former force could have equally well effected, was now achieved; -and Perry and other young men, who had come to the Mediterranean with their imaginations fired by the brilliant heroism which had been so recently displayed in the arena which now lay before them, were condemned only to see near at hand the heroes that were left from so many chivalrous encounters decked with the honours that they had won for themselves, to look upon the scenes which they had illustrated and ennobled by their valour, and to admire deeds which they were not permitted to imitate.

Subsequently to the arrival of Commodore Barron, some operations against the power of the reigning Bashaw of Tripoli, exceedingly romantic in their character, took place on the land, with which the Constellation is believed to have co-operated. The reigning bashaw did not succeed regularly to the sovereignty, but by usurpation, after having deposed his elder brother. The deposed prince had the good fortune to escape with his life, and, after many wanderings, took refuge in Egypt among the Mamelukes, by whom he was hospitably received. Mr. Eaton, our consul for many years in Tunis, having formerly been an officer in the revolutionary army, conceived the project of making use of the deposed prince to create an insurrectionary army, which should co-operate with our squadron before Tripoli for the overthrow of the reigning bashaw. The government adopted his plan on his arriving in the United States to unfold it, and he was sent out with Commodore Barron, with orders for the latter to aid him in his enterprise. Mr. Eaton was accordingly despatched to Alexandria, accompanied by a lieutenant of marines and two midshipmen, who volunteered to take part in this wild expedition.

Mr. Eaton lost no time in placing himself in communication with the deposed bashaw. A numerous party of adherents of the dethroned prince, refugees from Tripoli, and adventurers of all nations, amounting to about five hundred men, was speedily assembled, and Mr. Eaton assumed the command with the title of general. Traversing the desert, their baggage being carried by camels, this singular assemblage arrived, towards the close of April, before Dearné,<sup>1</sup> a seaport town within the pachalic of Tripoli. Here the general fell in with the American brig Argus, and the schooners Nautilus and Hornet; and, having received supplies of arms and ammunition, and the vessels having taken their stations so as to aid in battering the town, the forces of General Eaton marched to the assault, and, though resisted from behind the walls first, and subsequently from house to house, by more than threefold numbers, they gallantly made good their way into town. An army from Tripoli not long after appeared before the walls, and made several desperate attacks in the hope of recovering the stronghold. They were, however, gallantly repulsed by General Eaton; and the Constellation having opportunely appeared in the harbour at the close of the last attack, the enemy was thrown into consternation, broke up the siege, and abandoned their camp, with the greater portion of their heavy baggage.

About this time, the schooner Nautilus being in want of an officer, young Perry was ordered to her by Captain Campbell as first lieutenant, until the pleasure of the commodore should be known as to the appointment.

Flushed with his successes at Dearne, and having established the lawful pacha in possession of the second province of the pachalic.<sup>1</sup> General Eaton now urged Commodore Barron to furnish him with such supplies and assistance from the squadron as he thought would enable him to show himself before the walls of Tripoli with every prospect of a speedy termination of the war. The commodore, however, declined lending any more extensive aid than he had hitherto afforded, on the ground that, if the ex-pacha possessed the influence in the regency to which he laid claim, he was already in a situation to recover his authority. Soon after, Commodore Barron retired, on account of his low state of health, from the command of the squadron, which devolved again on Commodore J. Rodgers; and, not long after, a treaty of peace was concluded, in which the claim for tribute was abandoned by Tripoli, and ransom paid for the American prisoners remaining in possession of the regency after the exchange had been made for the Tripolitans taken by us during the war. This negotiation brought General Eaton's romantic expedition to a close, finding him still at Dearne, where, though he had advanced no farther, he had been able to maintain himself against every effort made to dislodge him.

On the conclusion of peace with Tripoli, the squadron proceeded to Tunis, the government of which had made some warlike demonstrations, in consequence of our vessels off Tripoli having captured a Tunisian cruiser, which, with two prizes in company, had been detected in an attempt to break the blockade. The bey had threatened our consul with war unless the vessels were instantly restored, and had furthermore declared that the arrival of our squadron in his waters would be looked upon by him as a commencement of hostilities. This threat did not prevent Commodore Rodgers from appearing off Tunis, where his spirited conduct, and the formidable armament, consisting in all of thirteen vessels, gunboats included, by which it was enforced, soon brought the bashaw into a more pacific mood. He readily consented to continue at peace on the terms of friendship heretofore existing between the two powers, and so far moderated his demand for the immediate restoration of the prizes as to express a wish to send a minister to Washington, to address his requests directly to the president. In this wish he was indulged, and his minister soon after embarked for the United States in the frigate Congress, commanded by Decatur.

At this conjuncture, the Constellation, in which young Perry had come out, returned to the United States. Being desirous of seeing more active service, and to obtain farther practice in schooner-sailing, he remained on board the Nautilus. This vessel was now despatched to Algiers, where she arrived at the moment of one of those frequent insurrections by which the form of government was wont to be summarily changed in that regency. The dey had rendered himself obnoxious both to the people and the soldiery by his extortion and cruelty. These broke out in revolt, and, headed by a captain of one of the cruisers, presented themselves at the castle, announced to the dey his deposition, and told him to fly immediately to a mosque if he would save his life. The dey went forth for the purpose, attended by his vizier, and both were cut to pieces as they cleared the outer gate of the castle. The heads of his adherents, and those who had grown rich under his favour, fell profusely on every side; and, at the end of an hour, a new dey was installed, salutes were fired, and all was once more as noiseless and tranquil as despotism could desire.

From Algiers the Nautilus proceeded to Gibraltar, to meet the commodore's despatches and procure supplies. In a letter to his mother from this place, dated in September, 1805, young Perry gives the particulars of his recent visit to Algiers. He also mentions that an army of fifteen thousand Spaniards were encamped before the Rock of Gibraltar. They were speedily to be re-enforced by an equal number of French, when they were to make an attack on the fortress which Napoleon was so anxious to possess. Perry mentions that the officers of the garrison were very confident in their ability to resist the assailants, and gave it as his opinion that their confidence was well founded. He mentions that he had been very kindly noticed by the commodore on the occasion of his last visit to the flag-ship, and had been offered orders, on the return of the Nautilus to the rendezvous at Syracuse, either to the eighteen-gun brig Siren as first lieutenant, or to the commodore's own ship, the Constitution. His letters manifest, as in his younger days, the most affectionate interest in his parents and brothers and sisters. His expressions of endearment are more than usually tender, and his eagerness to obtain information as to the welfare of those whom he loved extreme. They manifest, moreover, a tender solicitude, not unsuited to his age, for the welfare of fair friends, concerning whom his mother had failed to give him information.

When the Nautilus again fell in with the flagship, Perry was ordered by the commodore to the Constitution. The commodore had been attracted by his appearance, manners, and conversation; and in desiring to have him transferred to his own ship, had felt some anxiety lest the tall boy—for in age and appearance he was little more—should fail to come up to that high standard of seamanship and officer-like bearing which the commodore ever exhibited in himself and required in his officers. His misgivings in this respect were, however, soon set at rest; and he found that young Perry had so well employed his six years of almost uninterrupted service, that he was an excellent seaman, while his manner as an officer was in all respects admirable, calm, gentlemanly, dignified, and self-possessed. He was at this time, as ever after, rigorous in the observance of that etiquette which is one of the most useful barriers against irregularity and insubordination.

One of the earliest occasions of his attracting the attention of the commodore was on his making a complaint of a want of observance on board the flag-ship of the customary mode of receiving officers of his grade. This occurred while he was first lieutenant of the Nautilus. It had been the subject of remark, that the lieutenants of the other vessels were not always received with the usual honours, the boatswain's mates piping the side, the side-boys laying over to hold out the man-ropes, and the lieutenant of the watch at the gangway to receive his equal in grade. The lieutenants of the small vessels, whose sense of their dignity is usually in the inverse ratio of the size of their vessel, were not a little shocked at the omission. Young Perry said that the neglect ought to be remedied; and, accordingly, on the first occasion of his going on board the flag-ship, finding that the omission took place in his case, and that the complaint was true, stated the circumstance immediately to the commodore, who caused the proper honours to be thereafter studiously observed.

Perry's manner as an officer, and mode of carrying on duty at this early period, has obtained the highest eulogium that it could receive from one at that time his junior, the late Captain John Orde Creighton, himself so distinguished for his elegant manner of working ship. He was accustomed to speak of the effect produced upon him when he first heard young Perry manoeuvring the Constitution as officer of the deck; the admirable skill which he displayed being enhanced by the ease, grace, and dignity of his manner, and the matchless clearness and melody of his voice. The intonations of young Perry remained long after upon his ear, and his whole manner and deportment became the object of his emulation.

In the course of the cruise in the Constitution, Perry so effectually secured the approbation and kind feelings of Commodore Rodgers, that when, after the satisfactory settlement of our various difficulties with the Barbary powers, that officer prepared, towards the close of the summer of 1806, to return home, and shifted his flag for that purpose to the Essex, he took his young friend with him to that ship, in which he returned to the United States, where he arrived in October. On board the Essex Perry found in Mr. Daniel Murray a brother officer of congenial spirit, with whom he formed a warm and lasting friendship. From this gentleman we are able to obtain the following slight reminiscence of the homeward voyage of the Essex, and of the character and manners of Perry at this period: "My intercourse with him previously had been slight and casual; although on the same station, we had rarely been thrown together. On examining the dates of our commissions, I found that he ranked me, and he came home second lieutenant of the Essex. During our passage home, which was a very long one, within a few days of two months, I had great pleasure in cultivating Perry's acquaintance. His fine temper, gentle manners, and manly bearing, soon attracted and attached me to him strongly, and I believe our regard to each other was as sincere as it was lasting, having been uninterrupted to his death. I regret that I can lend but little assistance towards a minute narration of the incidents of the first few years of his service. There can be no doubt that they were well, and, I should think, unusually well employed; for his age when in the Essex could not have been much more than twenty-one, and he was then an excellent seaman, an accomplished officer, and a well-bred gentleman. His subsequent glorious career was just what I had anticipated."

CHAPTER IV.

Perry resumes his Studies at Newport.—Falls in Love.—Is employed in building Gunboats.—Is engaged to be Married.—Sails for New-York with Flotilla.—Employed in Protection of the Harbour.—Attack of the Leopard on the Chesapeake.—Perry's Feelings on the occasion.—British Spoliations on our Commerce.—Our inability to protect it.—Perry ordered to build more Gunboats.—Appointed to command the Revenge.—Attached to Commodore Rodgers's Squadron.—Ordered to Washington to refit.—Sails for Charleston.—Cruises on Southern Coast.—Encounter with a British Sloop.—Expects an Engagement.—Prepares to board.—Pacific Termination.—Returns to Charleston.—Proceeds to New-York.—Receives Instructions from Commodore Rodgers.—Is ordered to Newport.—Engaged in a Survey of the Sound.—Shipwreck of the Revenge.—Ineffectual efforts to save her.—Crew saved.—Court of Inquiry.—Perry honourably acquitted.—Furloughed.—Married.

ON the return of young Perry to Newport in the autumn of 1806, he resumed with diligence his mathematical and miscellaneous studies. Having, however, revived his intimacies of former years, he was soon drawn into the gayeties of the place, and thus led to make an acquaintance which, for a season, effectually put to flight his mathematical reveries. In January, 1807, at an assembly, he first met the lady who subsequently became his wife—Miss Elizabeth Champlin Mason. She had not yet completed her sixteenth year; was just entering life in the first bloom of loveliness, sparkling with feeling, intelligence, and talent, and gifted with a thousand rare qualities of truth, simplicity, fortitude, and warmhearted affection, which have steadfastly attended her through many a scene of joy and one of sorrow.

The professional employment of young Perry at Newport favoured their frequent meeting, and the acquaintance thus begun soon ripened into love. It was the season of the gunboat and embargo policy, that wretched system of supplying protection to our commerce from foreign spoliation, by annihilating it; of blockading our own harbours, and defending their egress against our own merchant vessels by means of gunboats, suited only to invite the aggression of belligerents at home by so futile a preparation to resist it, instead of accompanying our commerce, wherever it had a right to go, by formidable squadrons for its protection.

Perry having been appointed to superintend the construction of seventeen gunboats at Newport, was employed for several months in the neighbourhood where he was most desirous of remaining. Associated with him in this duty was his intimate friend and late shipmate in the Constellation, Lieutenant Samuel G. Blodgett, with whom, in what concerned his obligations as an officer and the dearest feelings of his heart, he could freely sympathize. It is creditable to young Perry, and shows the confidence of the Navy Department, based upon the favourable report of his various commanders, that he should have been chosen at so early an age to build, equip, and command this large detachment of gunboats; and the circumstance of his being ready in June to proceed with his force to New-York, shows that, with every private motive to delay, he must have used great energy and despatch in the execution of the service intrusted to him. Before his departure for New-York he became the pledged and accepted lover of Miss Mason.

The detachment of gunboats under the command of Lieutenant Perry was employed, with the rest of the flotilla stationed at New-York, in endeavours to protect the harbour and adjacent waters from the encroachments of the English and French belligerents, especially the former. It was while he was employed in this service that the British filled up the measure of insult and sanguinary outrage of our flag, by the attack of the Chesapeake frigate by the double-decked ship Leopard, which lay at anchor within our own waters in Lynnhaven Bay, waiting for the sailing of the Chesapeake, in order to take from her certain alleged deserters. While the humane feelings of the country were wounded by the causeless slaughter of a number of Americans, the national sense of honour was stung into keen resentment by the mortifying reflection that no effort had been made to maintain the glory of our flag ere it was lowered in dishonour. The feeling with which Perry received the intelligence of this cold-blooded attack is expressed in a letter written soon after to his father, who was at that time abroad. It is interesting, as showing the feeling with which he entered the struggle with England which soon after ensued; and his warning for her to "beware!" has since proved to be prophetic. "You must, ere this, have heard of the outrage committed by the British on our national honour, and feel with us all the indignation that so barbarous and cowardly an act must naturally inspire. Thank God! all parties are now united in the determination to resent so flagrant an insult. There is but one sentiment pervading the bosom of every American from North to South. The British may laugh, but let them beware! for never has the public indignation been so completely aroused since the glorious revolution that made us a nation of freemen. The utmost spirit prevails throughout the United States in preparing for an event which is thought inevitable, and our officers wait with impatience for the signal to be given to wipe away the stain which the misconduct of one has cast on our flag." The elder Perry could fully sympathize with this indignation of his son. He had returned to the merchant service, in which he had been for some years employed, either as a master or supercargo. On a recent voyage in command of an Indiaman, he had been detained by a British cruiser at the Cape of Good Hope under some one of the vexatious orders in council. A daily visit to the ship of the commanding officer, to plead for the release of his property from unjust detention, called forth almost daily some new indignity, until, outraged on one occasion beyond endurance by some taunt to his country, he knocked down the officer of the deck from whom he had received the insult. From the unpleasant consequences in which this affair involved him, he was released by the interference of an officer of rank, whom, when a soldier of the Kingston Reds, he had assisted in taking prisoner, and whom he had carried behind him on horseback to his father's house, where the prisoner had been hospitably entertained. More recently, Captain Perry had been detained, with other American shipmasters, in Lisbon, where a fresh insult against his country had involved him in a duel with a British officer, in which his antagonist had been wounded. He could therefore fully sympathize in the indignation expressed by his son, and only regret that his separation from the naval service of his country should prevent him from taking part in the struggle which had now become inevitable.

The war, which at that time was almost universal among the other maritime nations of the world, had thrown nearly all the carrying trade into the hands of our merchant ships. This exemption from the evils of war, and the immense profit we were deriving from our pacific and neutral position, excited much jealousy on the part of England and France, the two principal belligerents. Impelled by this jealousy, and by the predatory spirit which war invariably engenders; stimulated, moreover, by the desire of depriving each other of the advantages which they were mutually deriving from our trade, these nations took advantage of its unprotected state to pursue towards it a system of legalized spoliation. England had led the way with an order to her cruisers to capture all neutral merchant ships trading to the colonies of a belligerent at war with England, which belligerent did not permit such trade to her colonies during peace. This order was ostensibly intended to distress the French colonies in the West Indies and elsewhere; its immediate effects fell almost entirely on our commerce. Not long after, she declared the coasts of France, Holland, and Germany, from Brest to the Elbe, in a state of blockade; and, though such rigorous and effective blockade as is necessary to constitute a legal one was manifestly impossible over an extent of coast, including all its inflexions, of more than eight hundred miles, yet she so far enforced it as to make captures of such vessels as were accidentally detected in approaching these forbidden shores. The French emperor, though still less able to blockade the whole British coast, followed the example of England, and proclaimed it in a state of blockade; his cruisers and privateers actually making captures of neutral vessels on a coast where they only appeared themselves as fugitives, and at the imminent peril of capture. Such a system of warfare, in violation of all the hitherto established rights of neutrals, had a ruinous effect upon our trade, and threatened it with absolute annihilation. The improvidence of the government, and the sordid policy which it had pursued towards the navy, left it without the means of convoying our ships with formidable squadrons, and causing our rights to be respected. Even at that late hour for preparation for maritime defense, such ships as we possessed might have been fitted out, and others built, and sent abroad for the protection of our commerce. It was more congenial to the narrow and timid policy of that day to recall our commerce from the ocean, than to follow and protect it there. It was in this spirit that the embargo was proclaimed towards the close of 1807, and evils not less ruinous than the spoliations of the belligerents inflicted by ourselves. Instead of sending forth line-of-battle ships and frigates to convoy our merchant ships, it became necessary to have fresh recourse to the panacea of gunboats, and one hundred and eighty-eight additional boats were ordered to be built, which carried the whole number of this class of vessels to two hundred and fifty-seven, whose means of annoyance were directed against our own vessels, to prevent them from departing, and to maintain an effective blockade of our own ports.

Lieutenant Perry had so satisfactorily acquitted himself of the duty of constructing and equipping the seventeen gunboats, which he had carried to New-York and continued for a season to command there, that he was now ordered to commence the construction of an additional number, which were forthwith laid down at Westerly, on the Pawcatuck River, which forms the western boundary of Rhode Island, and at the adjacent village of Norwich, in Connecticut. In the construction of these boats he was employed from the beginning of February, 1808, until April, 1809, when, the vessels being completed, their farther equipment was suspended.

In the same month he was appointed to succeed Lieutenant Jacob Jones on board the schooner Revenge, of fourteen guns, then attached to the squadron under the command of Commodore Rodgers, who had his flag on board the Constitution. This squadron, consisting of four frigates, five sloops, and a number of smaller vessels, had been, as an after-thought to the gunboat system, wisely placed in commission, to assist in guarding our neutrality and protecting the sovereignty of our own coasts. The outrage on the Chesapeake had quickened the resentment, while it excited the watchfulness of our little navy. With the probability of a war with England mingled the reflection that we should have to contend with a formidable foe, to quicken the zeal of our officers in preparing for the struggle, and the chivalrous hope to wipe away the stain on the honor of the profession, which it had received in that ignominious encounter. The flower of our navy was rescued from the gunboat service and its inevitably deteriorating effects, the tendency of which was to destroy the discipline, moral character, and tone of the profession, and collected on board of a few ships of force, under commanders who had been trained at Tripoli, the whole being under the orders of Commodore Rodgers. Under the watchful guidance of this skilful and intrepid seaman and exactly rigid officer, our navy was brought to a state of discipline, efficiency, and readiness for action which has never been surpassed. If accident subsequently prevented that consummate commander from encountering an enemy of equal force during the war, the victories that were won by his more fortunate pupils were not a little owing to the training, discipline, and readiness for service which he had so universally introduced.

After cruising during the summer and winter in company with the squadron, Perry was ordered, in April, 1810, to proceed with the Revenge to Washington, to undergo extensive repairs at the navy-yard of that place. It is recorded in the log-book of the Revenge, that, in passing Mount Vernon in ascending the Potomac, the schooner fired a salute in honour of its former possessor, whose remains still repose there. This has been an honourable custom of our national vessels in passing this consecrated spot ever since we have had a navy; and though, in the regulations with regard to salutes, no provision is made for one on such an occasion, it is to be hoped that it may never be omitted, and, in order to this object, that it may be legalized by an express regulation.

The Revenge, having been put in order for a cruise, sailed from Washington on the twentieth of May, bound to Charleston, in the neighbourhood of which place she was ordered to be employed. Having touched at Norfolk, she proceeded to sea, and arrived safely at her destination, after a boisterous passage, without other accident or adventure of note recorded in the log-book than the falling overboard of a man, who, notwithstanding that it blew fresh and the schooner was going free under a press of sail, was recovered. The circumstance is thus sententiously recorded in the log-book: "At ten, thirty, Johnson Dickson, marine, fell overboard. Rounded to, out boat, brought him safe on board." We shall see in the sequel, and it is at once an evidence of Perry's humane feelings acting to excite and quicken him, and of his skilful seamanship, that he was unusually successful in his efforts to rescue shipwrecked and drowning men.

On the twenty-second of June, the Revenge again put to sea from Charleston, for the purpose of cruising on the neighbouring coast and protecting our waters against the encroachments of the British cruisers that were hovering about the coast, and of the French, should any be encountered. The orders under which he acted were to protect our merchantmen, and those of all other nations within our waters, extending to the distance of a marine league from the coast, from capture or molestation. Any foreign cruiser or privateer attempting to molest such merchant vessels was to be captured and sent in for adjudication. Any private armed vessel found hovering within our waters as thus described, with a view of making captures, was to be ordered off, and force used to compel her departure. If such vessel had increased her armament in the United States, she was to be sent in for adjudication. Any citizens of the United States found affording aid as pilots, or by furnishing supplies to such vessels hovering on the coast, were to be reported to the nearest United States attorney for prosecution.

In the middle of July, while in the neighbourhood of Cumberland Island on the coast of Georgia, the deputy United States marshal arrived on board the Revenge with a warrant from the United States district judge for the seizure of a ship then lying in Spanish waters, off Amelia Island, under English colours, and bearing the fictitious name of Angel, though known to be the ship Diana, of Wiscasset. It seems that the master of this vessel, by name James Tibbetts and by birth an Englishman, had fraudulently retained possession of the ship during several years, refusing to return with her to the United States, as the owners had urgently and repeatedly ordered him to do. Permission had been obtained from the Spanish governor of Amelia Island for the American authorities to take possession of the Diana, he being convinced that she was really an American vessel, belonging to the individuals in whose behalf she was claimed. The ship was, however, lying under the battery of the British gunbrig Plumper and schooner Jupiter, and, as she wore English colours, it was presumed that Tibbetts had procured from the English commander a promise of assistance; a presumption rendered reasonable enough by the frequent outrages of every sort committed by British cruisers on our commerce.

Lieutenant Perry immediately yielded to the request of the marshal that he would take possession of the Diana, and, having called to his assistance three gunboats stationed in the river St. Mary's so as to reduce the disparity of his force with the English force with which he was likely to have to contend, he proceeded to Amelia Island and took possession of the Diana, carrying her from under the guns of the English cruisers, and anchoring her off Cumberland Island. At the request of the agent, he now placed the sailingmaster of the Revenge on board of the Diana as master, to prosecute her voyage to Europe, and in a few days stood to sea in company with her, to convoy her off the coast. Before clearing the land, a large sail was discovered bearing down upon them from the southward and eastward. This was soon ascertained to be a British sloop-of-war. The Revenge was cleared for action so soon as the stranger was made out to be a cruiser. The ship rounded to alongside of the Revenge, and sent an officer on board of her to state that the sloop was H. B. M. ship Goree, Captain Byng, and to request that the commander of the schooner would come on board and explain the character of his vessel. Lieutenant Perry returned a distinct refusal; and having no idea of being "Leopardized" without one blow for the honour of the flag if his reply should prove displeasing, and having little hope of resisting in a fair cannonade with a vessel of double his force, he took a favourable position for boarding at a moment's warning in case of a shot or any show of hostility from the Goree. He was prepared to lead his whole crew over the bulwarks, armed with cutlasses, pistols, and battleaxes, the instant the two vessels should be in contact, and the suddenness and audacity of the assault might well have rendered it successful. This is the opinion of the officer from whom the anecdote, which is confirmed by the logbook, was received, William Sinclair, Esq., now a purser in the navy, and who served on board the Revenge as midshipman. He states, "Our crew consisted of about ninety good men; and, although the attempt to board might appear desperate, yet it was our belief at the time that, considering the Goree would not expect such an attempt, our gallant commander would have succeeded. His cool self-possession and admirable command of feature inspired every soul with enthusiastic confidence, and foreshadowed that gallant exploit on the lake which has rendered his name immortal."

Fortunately, the captain of the Goree was a reasonable man, and probably saw the impropriety of enforcing what he had asked for; he sent back his boat with a request that an officer might be sent from the Revenge to give the necessary information as to her character; and as this was merely doing what Captain Byng had already done, the request was readily granted, and a boat and officer in like manner sent from the Revenge to the Goree, to state the character of the Revenge and the name of her commander: a name which a very few years later would have been a familiar one.

The valuable services rendered by Lieutenant Perry in recovering the Diana called for the warmest thanks of those who were interested in her, and the circumstances attending it became known to the country in consequence of the publication by the secretary of the navy of the following letter, addressed by the agents of the ship to Lieutenant Perry, with a request that a copy of it might be forwarded to the secretary of the navy: "The Diana having arrived at Savannah in safety and sailed again upon her destined voyage, we avail ourselves of the opportunity to inform you thereof, and to tender to yourself and to the gentlemen of the squadron in the river St. Mary's under your command while there, in behalf of ourselves and the owners of the ship, our warmest thanks for the zeal and anxiety manifested by you for the honour and prosperity of the American flag. We cannot close this letter of thanks without expressing our admiration of the firmness and decision, properly tempered with moderation, evinced by you, when it seemed probable, from the reports in circulation, that a hostile course might have been adopted against the Diana, and of the complete state of preparation in which you constantly held yourself to repel any attack upon the sovereignty of the United States."

After cruising a short time on the coast of Georgia, the Revenge returned to Charleston. This was her place of rendezvous and of refit while on this station. Charleston was at that time a naval station, and the command vested for many years, in Commodore Campbell, Perry's old captain during two cruises to the Mediterranean. The partiality which the old gentleman had always felt for his youthful officer, and which had showed itself in forwarding his promotion to a lieutenant at a very early age, continued still to follow him with acts of kindness. His leisure hours at Charleston, in the brief intervals of his cruises, were always pleasantly spent in the society of his old commander and of a numerous circle of friends, with whom his acquaintance dated from this period, and who watched his future career with no little interest.

On the 10th of August the Revenge left Charleston for New-York, where she was again attached to the squadron under Commodore Rodgers, engaged in the protection of our coast from Cape Henry to the eastern limit of the United States. Here he received a circular from the commodore, enclosing another from the secretary of the navy, which he was ordered to communicate to his officers and crew. "You, like every other patriotic American," it stated, "have observed and deeply felt the injuries and insults heaped on our country by the two great belligerents of Europe; and you must also believe that from neither are we to expect liberality or justice, but, on the contrary, that no opportunity will be lost of adding to the outrages to which for years we have been subjected. Among these stands most conspicuous the inhuman and dastardly attack on our frigate Chesapeake; an outrage which prostrated the flag of our country, and has imposed on the American people cause of ceaseless mourning. That same spirit which originated and has refused atonement for this act of brutal injustice, exists still with Great Britain, and from France likewise we have no reason to expect any regard to our rights. What has been perpetrated may again be attempted. It is therefore our duty to be prepared and determined, at every hazard, to vindicate the injured honour of our navy, and revive the drooping spirit of the nation. Influenced by these considerations, it is expected that, while you conduct the force under your command consistently with the principle of a strict and upright neutrality, you are to maintain at every cost the dignity of our flag; and that, offering yourself no unjust aggression, you are to submit to none, not even a menace, from a force not materially your superior." As a commentary upon this letter, Commodore Rodgers added the following: "Circumstanced as we are with the two great belligerents of Europe, and particularly England, I should consider the firing of a shot by a vessel of war of either nation at one of our public vessels, while the colours of her nation are flying on board of her, as a menace of the grossest order, and, in amount, an insult which it would be disgraceful not to resent, by the firing of two shot at least; and that, under similar circumstances, should a shot be fired at one of our vessels, and strike any part of her, it ought to be considered an act of hostility, meriting chastisement to the utmost extent of all your force." The foregoing is chiefly interesting now by showing us the anxious preparation with which we went into the war with England, and by reminding us, in the contrast with our present position, of all that we have gained from it.

Kindly entering into Perry's strong desire to be employed in the neighbourhood of Newport, the commodore now assigned him to the extent of coast between Montauk Point and the south shoal of Nantucket as his cruising ground, with Newport for a rendezvous; and ordered him to proceed immediately to that place. He lost no time in obeying the order, and remained during the autumn in and about the harbour, occasionally making a cruise along the coast. The log-book bears evidence of a lively attention to whatever could render the vessel efficient and formidable. The training of the crew of the Revenge was not merely confined to the customary exercises of the great guns and small arms, but frequently, when under way, targets were thrown overboard, at which the crew were exercised in firing, exposed to the same swell of the ocean, the influence of which they would probably feel in a real encounter.

In the month of December Perry joined the commodore at New-London, and soon after received a communication from him, stating that, as the ports of New-London and Newport, together with Gardiner's Bay, possessed great advantages, from the circumstance that, at any season of the year, and with the wind from any quarter of the compass, the dullest sailing vessel could gain at least one of the three, and thus obtain a convenient and safe anchorage, he considered it a matter of much importance that a correct survey of the whole should be made, including the intermediate navigation, with the bearing of the various headlands, so as to form a single sheet chart of the whole on a large scale, and therefore instructed Perry forthwith to commence the necessary surveys for the completion of so desirable a work.

The selection of Perry for this purpose was due to his high standing as a seaman and an officer, and his superior scientific attainments. Pleased with the duty, and flattered by its being assigned to him, as is apparent from his reply to the order of the commodore, he set about the execution of it without loss of time, and repaired at once to Newport, with the survey of which he had been directed to commence his operations. Though the object of the commodore was enlightened and laudable, the season of the year which had been selected for this survey was certainly very unsuitable. Perry set about it, however, with a good will, and with a perfect indifference to the exposure so far as he was himself concerned. The commodore had ordered him to complete the survey of Newport, and return to New-London within a week. But the weather was very severe, and the boats were unavoidably occupied in communicating with the shore, and bringing off water and provisions. At the end of the week, little had been done towards the survey; but Perry determined, in compliance with his orders, to return to New-London, and obtain from the commodore an extended term to complete the service.

A contrary wind, attended by a thick fog, prevented him for several days from sailing. At length, on the eighth of January, 1811, the weather cleared off, and he sailed with a light northeast wind from Newport at midnight, in order to have daylight to pass through the Race, as the dangerous strait between Fisher's Island and Watch Hill is called. Mr. Peter Daggett, a well-known coasting and Sound pilot, was on board the Revenge in the character of acting sailing-master and pilot. After the schooner had been under way about an hour, it became once more foggy. Perry asked Daggett if he could take the schooner to New-London in such weather. He replied, without hesitation, that he could. Perry ordered an anchor to be kept ready for letting go, and told the pilot if he had any doubt, to come to anchor at once. At six in the morning the Revenge passed Point Judith in fourteen fathoms. The distance from thence to Watch Hill, the next headland, was estimated by pilots and laid down on the chart as thirty miles on a nearly west course. As the vessel was only going three knots, and the ordinary strength of the flood-tide, which was then setting, was estimated at two knots, it was computed that at least six hours' of such sailing would be necessary to bring the schooner up with Watch Hill Reef, which makes out from the headland of that name. She was, however, on account of the fog, steered a point off shore, or to the south of the usual course. At nine o'clock, Perry being below, heard the leadsman, there being one in each chain, give ten fathoms as the cast, the previous casts having been from eleven to fourteen fathoms. He immediately went on deck and ordered the helm to starboard; he found that it was already to starboard, having been put so by order of the pilot. The schooner came rapidly round until she headed south by west; but, as she still shoaled her water to five, three, and at last to two and a half fathoms, which showed that she was embayed by the reef, Perry ordered the anchor to be let go. It was instantly let go, and, at the same moment, her stern struck. The anchor checked her bows round so as to enable her to head out clear of the reef, the signal spindle on which was now visible, and a light breeze springing up at the same moment, Perry ordered the sails to be trimmed, and, as the schooner shot ahead, gave the order to cut the cable. She ranged a short distance ahead, when the wind failing, and the swell and flood-tide coming in strong at the same moment, canted her round bows on to the reef.

As it was the top of high water, the chances of saving the vessel were very slender. Nevertheless, the boats were hoisted out and sent to sound, and a kedge and hawser carried out in the direction of the deepest water. The hawser being hove well taught, eight of the guns were thrown overboard, and whatever heavy articles could be got at. The water was started, the pumps working incessantly, and hands employed at the same time in baling with buckets, for she had begun to leak badly. Minute guns were fired as signals of distress to bring off assistance; and, as the schooner laboured and thumped heavily, Perry ordered the mainmast to be cut away, and soon after the foremast also. In twenty minutes after the schooner struck, she bilged in two places.

No hope now remaining of saving the vessel, Perry gave his whole thoughts to the business of saving the crew intrusted to his care. The signal guns had brought several boats from the shore, but the swell rendered it difficult and dangerous to approach the wreck. Nevertheless, the sick were lowered into the boats by carefully watching the swell, and after them the marines and boys, and sent on shore. During the rest of the day, the boats from the shore, with those of the schooner, were busily employed in removing whatever was of most value. By sunset nearly everything movable, including the sails, rigging, and small arms, was removed. The wind had now come on to blow violently on the reef, and the surf nearly broke over the vessel, which was fast going to pieces; the cold, moreover, was intense. Under these circumstances, the duty which Perry owed to the officers and men who had remained toiling with him on the wreck throughout the day, rendered it incumbent on him to remove them to a place of safety. They were with difficulty enabled to reach the boats by lowering themselves from ropes over the stern, and Perry was himself the last to leave the wreck. On reaching the shore, the crew were mustered and distributed to the various houses for the night.

On the following morning, a portion of the wreck, consisting of the deck and bulwarks, was discovered to have floated off the reef. The launches of the President and Constitution frigates had arrived from New-London during the night, under charge of Lieutenants Ludlow and Morris, to render assistance. By the aid of these, Perry went off to the wreck and took it in tow, in order to beach it on Fisher's Island. While engaged in this effort, it came on to blow heavily from the northeast, attended with sleet and excessive cold. A smack hired by the commodore had arrived, and assisted in towing the wreck. The remainder of the schooner's armament, consisting of six light carronades, was now taken into the launches. When nearly up with the island, the hawser attached to the wreck parted, and the violence of the sea breaking over the vessel prevented any attempt to approach her to make fast again. The wreck was therefore abandoned, and the smack, with the launches in tow, ran into New-London to take refuge from the storm.

As is usual in such cases, a court of inquiry was ordered to take into consideration the circumstances attending the loss of the Revenge, and to make a minute report of all the facts, upon which the secretary of the navy could found a judgment as to the necessity of farther proceedings. This court, which consisted of Captain Hull, and Lieutenants Ludlow and Morris, decided that the fault of getting the vessel on shore rested with the pilot alone; that every possible exertion had been made by Lieutenant Perry, first to get his vessel afloat, and then to watch over the preservation and welfare of the sick and helpless portion of his crew, and lastly to preserve whatever was most valuable of the vessel's furniture. It was proved that his manner had been unchanged by the peril and anxiety of his situation; that his orders had been given in his calm and ordinary tone, and executed with the same cheerfulness and order as on common occasions, and that the most perfect discipline and subordination had been preserved throughout the whole trying scene. It was only from the evidence of others that the fact was elicited that he had been himself the last to leave the vessel.

In reviewing these circumstances, we will find that Perry exhibited in this moment of disaster not a few of the qualities which were afterward displayed on a more brilliant as well as more fortunate field of adventure; the same calmness, the same self-composure, the same indomitable unwillingness to yield to the pressure of overpowering circumstances, the same humane sympathy with the suffering; storms, cold, which so often benumb the stoutest heart, the perils of rocks and waves, had no power to unman him or bend him from his duty; and we find him, on the morning after the disaster, returning to the wreck, and clinging to the few remaining planks of the vessel which had been intrusted to him with unyielding tenacity. The impression made upon the secretary of the navy by the evidence adduced before the court of inquiry may be gathered from the following letter, addressed by him to Commodore Rodgers:

"Having attentively examined the proceedings of the court, I derive much satisfaction from perceiving that it is unnecessary to institute any farther proceedings in the case. With respect to Lieutenant Perry, I can only say, that my confidence in him has not been in any degree diminished by his conduct on the occasion. The loss of the Revenge appears to be justly chargeable to the pilot. This accident will no doubt present to Lieutenant Perry considerations that maybe useful to him in future command. An officer, just to himself and to his country, will not be depressed by defeat or misfortune, but will be stimulated by either cause to greater exertions. If there should be any situation in the squadron to which you can appoint Lieutenant Perry that may be consistent with his just pretensions, and not interfere with the rights of others, you will appoint him to it; if not, he is to be furloughed, waiting the orders of this department."

After returning to Newport, Perry made a visit to Washington. He was kindly received by Mr. Paul Hamilton, then secretary of the navy, who had conceived a favourable opinion of him from the circumstances attending his late southern cruise in the Revenge, from his conduct during the disaster which had deprived him of his command, and the approving testimony of his various commanders. The chief object of his visit was to ascertain whether he could remain undisturbed for a year by any call of duty which would withdraw him from Newport. Having been reassured on this subject by receiving a leave of absence for that term, he returned with a light heart to Newport, and on the fifth of the following May he was married to Miss Mason, after an engagement of four years. An attachment tested by so long a probation, and strengthened by every fresh observation of each other's qualities of character and of heart, promised as fair a share of wedded happiness as ever falls to the lot of mortals. Until death interposed to separate the devoted pair, this promise was most amply redeemed.

The wedding tour of the young couple consisted in a journey of some length, over various parts of New-England, with which both of them were desirous of becoming better acquainted. In the course of the tour they passed a day at Plymouth, in which place Perry took a particular interest, from its having been the residence, for a time, of the first of his ancestors who had emigrated to America.

MEANTIME, no improvement had taken place in our relations with England. The embargo had been found so ruinous to our commerce, so difficult of enforcement, and so very unpopular, that it had been revoked after a duration of more than a year, and a state of non-intercourse with France and England substituted for it. France, having no commerce of her own, suffered greatly more than England from this suspension of trade. On this account, and not from any superior sense of justice, Napoleon was induced so far to relax his predatory spoliations on our commerce as to bring himself within a provision of the non-intercourse act, by which, in case of the repeal, on the part of either of the belligerents, of their offensive measures against our commerce, it was to be suspended. England, under the protection of her numerous fleets, being in the full enjoyment of her customary trade, was less sensibly affected by a nonintercourse with us, though still, even at that time, for her an evil of no trifling magnitude. She continued to persevere in all her offensive measures towards us. Her orders in council were conceived not in justice or any recognized usage of nations, but simply in the interest of her commercial jealousy. She destroyed our commerce, not because it fostered the strength of her enemies and gave them ability to resist, but because it interfered with the employment of her own shipping, and the gains of an illicit traffic which she herself carried on with them. As was said, with no less truth than point, in the president's message in June of 1812, "She carries on a war against the lawful commerce of a friend, that she may the better carry on a commerce with an enemy; a commerce polluted by the forgeries and perjuries which are, for the most part the only passports by which it can succeed."

But the most exasperating of her attacks upon us was the perpetual violation of our flag by her cruisers, not only on the great highway of nations, but upon our own coasts and even within our own waters, for the purpose of impressing our native seamen under the plea of their being Englishmen, or the insulting pretext of their having been impressed before. In this way hundreds of Americans were annually torn from under the safeguard of our national banner, compelled to serve on board of British ships, to lose their lives in the cause of their oppressors, or be made instrumental in taking away the lives of those with whom their country owned no enmity. And this exasperating system was pursued in a manner the most haughty and insulting. The British navy had been demoralized by the extensive system of plunder carried on under the orders in council, and a predatory and freebooting spirit had become a prevailing characteristic in it; while the absence of all opposition from the weak victims of its injustice had fostered an insolent and overbearing demeanor. The outrage of impressment from on board our merchant vessels, extreme in itself, was almost always accompanied by unmeasured insult.

It was a circumstance of this nature that brought the President frigate out, on the occasion when, while in search of the Guerrière, she fell in with the Little Belt in the night, and an accidental rencounter took place, for which the contempt of the English and the well-grounded exasperation of the Americans mutually prepared them. British contempt had, however, the greatest share in bringing on the contest, as the Little Belt was the first to fire. She was also, as might have been expected from her vastly inferior force, the greatest sufferer, though beyond all proportion with her relative strength. This rencounter added new intensity to the feeling of aversion existing between the two countries; and Great Britain showing no disposition to do us justice for her past aggressions against the honour of our flag and the sanctity of the persons of our citizens, or to discontinue them for the future, we were compelled at length to adopt the only honourable alternative that remained to us, that of declaring war. This alternative, from which an earlier display of spirit and development of our vast latent naval power would have saved us, was resorted to in June of 1812.

In expectation of this event, Perry had hastened to Washington to endeavour to procure active employment at sea. He was promised the first vacancy suited to his rank that should occur, and, in the mean time, was ordered to take command of four gunboats then laid up at Newport, together with four others, the construction of which he had superintended at Norwich and Westerly in 1808 and 1809, immediately previous to his taking command of the Revenge. He had now been promoted to the rank of master commandant, and, was appointed to the chief command of the flotilla stationed at Newport for the defence of the harbour and adjacent waters. He forthwith opened rendezvous at Newport and at New-London for recruiting the petty officers and seamen. He was ordered by the secretary of the navy to designate suitable persons to command the gunboats, and accordingly selected various officers of the navy and experienced shipmasters, who, on his recommendation, were duly appointed, with the rank of acting sailing-master. His connexion with the officers and men of the Newport flotilla is chiefly interesting, as it was continued on a more important sphere of action. Among the persons employed in this service were midshipman Daniel Turner, acting masters W. V. Taylor and Stephen Champlin, and purser Samuel Hambleton—all names advantageously conspicuous in the battle of Lake Erie. Lieutenant S. G. Blodgett, the friend of his earlier professional years, was also associated with him in this command. Subsequently, four more gunboats from New-York were added to the Newport flotilla, making the whole force under his command twelve gunboats, manned by about two hundred officers and men. Two of them were stationed off Stonington, and the remainder at and about Newport, to watch the cruisers of the enemy, and repel any marauding attack on the villages of the neighbouring coasts. These vessels were generally armed with a single long twenty-four pounder, and had a complement of thirty men, exclusive of the officers.

The service that could be rendered by such a force was slight, and its purely defensive character rendered it uncongenial to the temper and feelings of Perry. Nevertheless, he devoted himself to the duties of his station as commandant of the flotilla with earnest zeal, and his official correspondence of the time bears evidence of his anxious and untiring efforts for the defence of the coast intrusted to his vigilance, and for the annoyance of the enemy. The tone of his correspondence is respectful, modest, and decided. What he has to say is always expressed briefly and sententiously, and there is nowhere the slightest trace of that professional jealousy or pique which is apt to grow up between officers of the same or of different arms, stationed in the neighbourhood of each other. In the whole mass of his letters to his inferiors—and, as there were twelve vessels under his orders, most of them generally at a distance, they were sufficiently numerous—there is not a single harsh, dictatorial, or wounding expression; but one contains an approach towards reproof. It is expressed as follows: "I wrote you some days since to repair to this place, with the boats under your command, without loss of time, and am a little surprised to find that you have not yet arrived. Should this find you in New-London, you will sail immediately for this, if the weather will at all permit." This absence of reproof shows the absence of necessity for it; a state of discipline that prevented offences rather than occupied itself with punishing them. It proves the extraordinary personal influence that Perry everywhere exerted from his earliest years; something which has been described by those who knew him intimately as winning affection while it repelled familiarity. It also gives evidence of that distinctive faculty of greatness, intuitive perception of character, and unerring judgment in the selection of agents to carry out his views. Perry did not make a single bad appointment. Each person who acted under him became his warm and devoted friend, and his friends proved all true men. To the various letters which he constantly received from the minor civil authorities on the extended line of coast under his protection, whose apprehensions rendered them importunate and unreasonable, and sometimes uncivil, he replied with uniform calmness, conciliation, and urbanity.

The following letter, much the longest to be found in his correspondence, furnishes a fair specimen of his style of professional communication. It was called forth by an order of the government, issued immediately after the gunboats were equipped and manned, and, as it appears from Captain Perry's letter, before the crews had worked out their advance, for the discharge of all but eight of the twenty-four men, exclusive of officers and petty officers, composing the crew of each boat. The motive of this reduction was economy, and it was proposed to trust to the chance of procuring volunteers to supply the place of the discharged seamen. Captain Perry's letter is cogent and to the point; it shows completely the fallacy of trusting to such a resource. It is dated at Newport on the twenty-seventh of July, and is addressed to the secretary of the navy.

"Having received an order a few days since to discharge all the crews of the gunboats under my command, except eight men to each, I consider it a duty to inform you of the probable result of that order. From the peculiar situation of this town, a ship may, from the time she is discovered in the offing, be at anchor in this harbour in less than an hour and a half.<sup>1</sup> The water up the bay is sufficient for vessels of the heaviest draught, and the towns of Providence, Bristol, Warren, Wickford, and Greenwich are without fortifications of any kind. There are very few seamen in this place at present, most of the ships belonging to it being absent. It will therefore be impossible to expect any assistance, or, if any, very trifling, on an emergency, from them. But, sir, if volunteers could be procured, the enemy would give us so little time—for no doubt they would take a favourable wind to come in—that it would be impossible to beat up for them, get them on board, and station them before probably the occasion for their services would be entirely over. From the circumstance of the gunboats here being for the defence of so many valuable towns, totally defenceless in other respects, and from the singularly exposed situation of this town to the sudden invasion of an enemy, I hope, sir, an exception may be made in favour of the boats on this station, and that they may be permitted to retain their full complement of men. I forbear to say anything of the situation of an officer who commands a large nominal force, from whom much is expected, and by whom little can be performed."

The foregoing letter evinces a lively interest in the welfare of his native state, which fully justifies the affection with which its citizens cherish his memory. It betrays no desire or willingness to acquiesce in an arrangement which would have removed from him in a great measure the responsibility which he was under for the protection of the coasts intrusted to his defence. He wished to be armed at all points, and then held responsible for the result. The zeal with which Perry executed the duties of his command is the more commendable, on account of his extreme desire for active employment at sea, which had not only led him to make repeated applications to the navy department, but had induced him in June, just before his appointment to the command of the Newport flotilla, to make a journey to Washington, and exert all the influence he could bring forward to procure him the command of a sloop-of-war. His own earnest solicitation and that of his friends were, however, powerless to procure him his coveted opportunity for distinction. He returned to his uncongenial command, and devoted himself to it faithfully. In the training of his crew to the exercise of great guns and small arms, with the use of the cutlass and pike, he personally took unwearied pains, as well as in drilling them in the necessary manoeuvres to enable them to act with effect on shore. Occasionally he assembled his gunboats together, and carried them through the various evolutions in the management of fleets, and, often dividing them into adverse squadrons, one under his own orders, the other under Lieutenant Blodgett's, would carry on a mimic engagement. This was not the kind of engagement for which he was at that time sighing, but it was not, perhaps, a useless preparation for one; and it is not unlikely that he may thus have acquired a facility in manoeuvring a number of vessels, or formed some conception of advantages to be gained and critical moments to be seized on in the encounter of fleets that were afterward useful to him.

When, soon after the war began, the Constitution captured the Guerrière, after a short and brilliant action, and the country blazed with enthusiasm from one extremity to the other, Perry was more taken up with sharing this enthusiasm than overcome by chagrin at his own present exclusion from any chance of participating in the glory of the victors, and the acclamation with which they were everywhere received.

It will be remembered that Lieutenant Charles Morris was promoted after the action two grades for having well performed his subordinate duties of first lieutenant of the Constitution. It would have been a proper, suitable, and customary reward for his good conduct if he had been made a master commandant, to date from the day of the victory. But it was a manifest violation of propriety, and of all that was due to the rights and feelings of the whole grade of masters commandant, thus to promote over their heads a lieutenant who had done his duty faithfully in a purely subordinate character. The greatest injustice, however, which it involved was to the veteran commander of the Constitution [Captain Isaac Hull], under whose orders the victory had been won; himself a practised seaman and thorough officer, and who has ever been eminently the captain of his own ship. There was no promotion for the chief in command, and the liberality of the country was not equal to creating a new grade in order to promote him, when that new grade was otherwise necessary to the prosperity of the service. Instead of promoting him, the absence of promotion was made more sensible by raising his subordinate during the action two grades, and making him, by a single stroke of the pen, his equal.

Perry was one of the commanders over whose heads Lieutenant Morris was thus summarily promoted. He took a different view of this act from all others of his grade. The chivalrous magnanimity of his feelings on this occasion not only led him to acquiesce in Lieutenant Morris's promotion, but even to take a pointed means of showing it. Mr. Morris had reached Providence, where he was lying ill of a dangerous wound he had received during the action, when Perry first heard that he was to be promoted at once to a postcaptaincy. He told his intimate friend, Mr. William S. Rogers, subsequently a purser in the navy, and from whom the anecdote is derived, that this contemplated promotion had occasioned much dissatisfaction among the commanders and lieutenants above Morris. This feeling Perry said he did not share, and proposed to make a visit to Providence in one of the gunboats under his command, in order to express to Morris his own views on the subject. Perry went accordingly, and Mr. Rogers accompanied him, and was present at the interview, which he represents as having been singularly interesting. After inquiring with much solicitude concerning Mr. Morris's health, he cordially congratulated him on the brilliant result of his cruise, and told him that his contemplated promotion to a post-captaincy met with his hearty approbation. He hoped that the same reward might attend any future display of gallant conduct; a hope the more generous and disinterested, that his own more advanced rank would not allow him, in case of like good fortune, to be so largely benefited. The unassuming and modest deportment of Mr. Morris, who was sensibly struck with this generous effort to relieve him from the painful feelings which the opposition of those he was about to supersede had evidently occasioned him in his debilitated state of health, and the frank and chivalrous bearing of Perry, which had in it a consciousness that he too would one day deserve the gratitude of his country if the opportunity were but given to him, rendered the whole scene most striking and impressive. Nor did Perry's generous feelings towards Mr. Morris end here. When he was subsequently promoted to a captaincy and appointed to the Adams, a noble corvette with twenty-eight guns on one deck, thus rewarded for his past services and placed in a situation to win more glory, Perry, who was ineffectually seeking for the command of a sea-going vessel of half that force, instead of giving way to any envious or ill-natured feelings towards him, took pleasure in rendering him every facility in procuring a crew, allowed the best of his own men to volunteer for the Adams, in order to go where they could be more useful, sent Mr. Daniel Turner to Providence to recruit men for her, and subsequently parted with that favourite officer, in order that he might place himself in the path to distinction. Having induced Captain Morris to receive Mr. Turner on board his ship, he sent him off with a draught of efficient seamen, without waiting for the orders which Captain Morris had told him would be speedily forwarded. Every officer in the navy will appreciate the generous self-denial of Perry's conduct; it is as rare in the service, and as difficult to imitate as it is every way worthy of admiration. The reader will not fail to contrast it, in the sequel, with the conduct which, under like circumstances, was observed towards Perry.

A most distressing circumstance attended Perry's service in command of the flotilla at Newport, in the loss of his excellent and warmly-attached friend and shipmate, Lieutenant Blodgett. He had got under way at noon on the twenty-ninth of October, in gunboat number forty-six, to look round outside of the harbour. The wind was light from northeast when he started, but it came on to blow heavily when he had reached the open ocean off the mouth of the harbour. He immediately hauled his wind, and commenced working back for the mouth of the harbour. The swell setting heavily along the shore, and the tide running ebb, the schooner, which, like most of the gunboats, was dull and sluggish, worked slowly to windward. Still Blodgett did not like to bear up and run into the Sound, which was his only alternative. He continued to beat to windward, standing close in to the shore to avoid the tide and prolong the benefit of the long tack. In attempting to tack off the lighthouse on the south point of the island of Connanicut, the schooner missed stays; a second attempt was made to tack her, which equally failed; and a last effort was made to veer her, in the hope that, though very close in, she might still clear the rocks. The schooner paid off a little, when the undertow neutralizing the effect of the helm, she went broadside to against the rocks. The sea now made a complete breach over the vessel. Blodgett at once saw that there was not the slightest hope of saving the vessel, and far from a certainty of saving the lives of the crew, for the night had just set in, and the weather was cold. It would depend entirely on the personal exertion of each to get ashore before the vessel should go to pieces, and he accordingly gave the order for each man to provide for his own safety, being determined not to leave the vessel himself until every man should gain the shore; in short, not to be saved himself if one of his crew were lost. He was soon after washed overboard, and his body was never recovered; nine others, out of eighteen composing the crew, shared the fate of their commander. Perry briefly but feelingly narrated the circumstances to the secretary of the navy, and by the same mail communicated the mournful intelligence to Blodgett's father, expressing, in doing so, a melancholy satisfaction in being able to assure him that his son, in the last trying scene of his life, had acted with a firmness and decision most honourable to his memory. In Blodgett Perry lost an old, a sincere, and a warmly-attached friend, as well as a most useful assistant. Had he lived, he would doubtless have accompanied him to Lake Erie as his second in command, and shared the glory of a victory which the presence of an attached, courageous, and truehearted coadjutor would have rendered of so much earlier achievement.

Towards the close of November Perry made another effort to procure service which would bring him in contact with the enemy, by using the personal solicitation at Washington of his intimate friend, Mr. W. S. Rogers, who went there for the purpose of settling Perry's accounts during the past five years. He at the same time addressed a letter to the secretary, which is interesting as showing his desire for active employment anywhere, and having probably led to his being ordered to the Lakes. It ran as follows: "I have instructed my friend, Mr. W. S. Rogers, to wait on you with a tender of my services for the Lakes. There are fifty or sixty men under my command that are remarkably active and strong, capable of performing any service. In the hope that I should have the honour of commanding them whenever they should meet the enemy, I have taken unwearied pains in preparing them for such an event. I beg therefore, sir, that we may be employed in some way in which we can be serviceable to our country." He at the same time made an offer of his services to Commodore I. Chauncey, who had recently been appointed to command on the Lakes.

In the course of Mr. Rogers's interview with the secretary, some conversation occurred about employing Captain Perry on Lake Erie, to build and organize a squadron, to meet one which the enemy were about preparing on that lake. Nothing definite, however, was decided; and, in a week after Perry's letter was written, the British frigate Macedonian arrived as a prize to the frigate United States, and in charge of his old shipmate and friend, Lieutenant William H. Allen. He received him also with cordial congratulations, lent him every assistance in providing for the comfort of the wounded, and furnished him with thirty men to assist in navigating the ship to New-York. In announcing her arrival at his station, he expressed to the secretary his opinion that she was one of the finest frigates he had ever seen. He had no disposition to disparage the victories of others, though it caused him infinite grief that he was denied the opportunity of sharing them.

Soon after it was decided to increase the navy by four line-of-battle ships, six large frigates, and six sloops. He thought that commands of a higher class being thus provided for those of his own grade that were above him, some of the sloops would be left vacant. He had been so often disappointed, however, that he was not very sanguine; and, in writing to Captain Morris to announce that he had sent him some men, and to describe the character of one petty officer whom he had sent, whom he thought would make a good gunner, he says to him, "Does the government intend building the ships immediately, or will it wait until timber seasons? I despair of getting to sea very shortly, unless I should be fortunate enough to get the Hornet."

In order to nourish the faint chance of employment at sea which grew out of this contemplated advancement of his seniors, and, at the same time, to benefit his native state, to whose interests and welfare he was ever watchfully attentive, he now devoted himself to the task of obtaining accurate information as to the shipbuilding capabilities of his state. The result of his inquiries he reduced to a tabular form, stating in separate columns the quantity of suitable ship-timber, mines of iron ore, number of smelting forges and trip-hammers, and of ship-carpenters, joiners, rope and sail makers, and all the various descriptions of artisans employed in the construction and equipment of ships. He also mentioned the fact that there was a sufficiency of seasoned timber to construct a frigate, and that the mechanics, being unemployed, would work at low wages.

In January of 1813 he received a serious annoyance in learning the appointment of Lieutenant Allen, who had recently arrived in charge of the Macedonian, to the command of the brig Argus of twenty guns. This vessel had recently been commanded by mastercommandant Arthur Sinclair, who, on the termination of his cruise, had relinquished the command of her. Commodore Decatur, who was senior officer afloat in New-York when the Argus arrived, placed Lieutenant Allen on board of her when Captain Sinclair left her, in the hope that he would subsequently be promoted and confirmed in the command, which, in fact, proved to be the case. This infringement of his just rights, and violation of the solemn promise made to him at the commencement of the war by the then secretary of the navy, and which was equally binding on the gentleman who had recently succeeded him, Perry felt most sensibly, as is apparent from the following letter to the new secretary of the navy, Mr. William Jones. It is dated on the twenty-ninth of January, 1813.

"I am informed by Lieutenant Allen that he has charge of the U. S. brig Argus, by order of Commodore Decatur. Although I have the highest opinion of Mr. Allen as an officer, and the warmest regard for him as a friend, yet justice to myself demands that I should solicit this vessel, provided Captain Sinclair is not to resume the command of her. On the first prospect of a declaration of war, I hastened to Washington in the hope of obtaining active employment; but, unfortunately, there was no vacancy. The honourable secretary of the navy, however, promised me the first one that should occur suitable to my rank; none has occurred until the present. I therefore hope, sir, I may be gratified in being appointed to the Argus, as it is my earnest wish to have an opportunity of showing my devotion to the cause of my country. Mr. Allen has already had an opportunity of evincing his gallantry and good conduct, and is in possession of the admiration and respect of his countrymen."

On the same day he wrote to Captain Sinclair, stating the application he had made for the Argus, in the event only of Captain Sinclair's having entirely relinquished the command, as, in the contrary case, he had no wish whatever to interfere, but considered himself as standing next for the command. He wrote also to Mr. J. B. Howell, then a senator in Congress from Rhode Island, to explain the injustice which would be done to him by the appointment of his junior to the command of the Argus, and to procure his influence in aid of his claim. "Possessing," as he tells this gentleman, "an ardent desire to meet the enemies of my country, I have earnestly solicited this situation, and beg you will back my application to be employed in a manner more congenial to my feelings." His letter indicates an apprehension that some lingering distrust of him existed at the department with regard to the loss of the Revenge; for he forwarded a copy of the proceedings of the court of inquiry on the subject to Mr. Howell, with the expression of a hope that its perusal would satisfy him that no blame could attach to him from that unfortunate disaster. It gives pain thus to see Perry stooping to the office of self-vindication. To his friend Allen he frankly stated all that he had done, and forwarded to him a copy of his letter to the secretary on the same day that it was written. It is impossible to do otherwise than admire the noble magnanimity of his conduct throughout this transaction. His "ardent desire to meet the enemies of his country" does not allow him for a moment to forget or disregard what was due to his brother officers; the injustice which was about to be done to himself quickens his sense of the delicacy that was due to others.

He had also indulged the hope of obtaining the command of the Hornet, in expectation of the probable promotion of Captain Lawrence, her commander; but, shortly before her return from her successful cruise, during which she had captured the Peacock, the means of distinction had already been provided for Perry. On the first of February, 1813, he received a letter from Commodore Chauncey, to whom, in the previous December, he had made a tender of his services, stating that he had applied to the secretary of the navy to have him ordered to the Lakes. The commodore took occasion to pay Perry the following compliment, which plainly indicates that his character was already recognized in the service, and understood by the commodore. "You are the very person," he writes, "that I want for a particular service, in which you may gain reputation for yourself and honour for your country." This particular service was the command of a naval force to be created on Lake Erie. In a few days he was advised by his friend Rogers that the new secretary of the navy, Mr. Jones, had readily consented to Commodore Chauncey's request, and decided to order him to Lake Erie, with a detachment of the best men under his command at Newport. He was to build two heavy brigs on the lake to meet the force prepared by the enemy. "You will doubtless," wrote Mr. Rogers, "command in chief. This is the situation Mr. Hamilton mentioned to me two months past, and which, I think, will suit you exactly; you may expect some warm fighting, and, of course, a portion of honour."

ON the seventeenth of February Captain Perry received orders from the secretary of the navy to proceed to Sackett's Harbour with all the best men under his command in the flotilla. At that place he was to receive farther instructions from Commodore Chauncey with regard to his future proceedings in command of the force to be created on Lake Erie. So prompt was he to execute these orders, and reach the scene where his friend had held out to him the prospect of hard fighting and an attendant harvest of honour, and so ready was the force under his command to move in any direction, that he sent off on that very day, notwithstanding the inclement season of the year, a detachment of fifty men and officers, under the command of sailing-master Almy. They were to proceed to Albany by the way of Providence. On the nineteenth he despatched fifty men, under sailing-master Champlin, and the remaining fifty on the twenty-first, under sailing-master W. V. Taylor. His object in thus dividing them was to increase the facility of procuring conveyances for the men and accommodation on the road.

On the morning of the twenty-second of February, a day of happy omen for the commencement of an American enterprise, Captain Perry delivered up the command of the flotilla to the officer next in rank, and set forward on his journey to Sackett's Harbour. At that season of the year, and at that period in the settlement of the interior of our country, this was a journey of no little hardship and fatigue. He crossed the ferry to Narragansett in his boat during a violent rain storm, and immediately proceeded to Pawcatuck, and thence to New-London and Lebanon; his object in following this route being to visit his parents, who resided at the latter place, before his departure on so perilous a service, and from which his return was so uncertain. After passing a few hours with his family, he departed for Hartford in the evening in an open sleigh, taking with him his brother Alexander, then a lad of less than twelve years. The cold was intense, and they suffered severely before their arrival at Hartford, which they only reached at midnight. There Captain Perry got on the mail-route to Albany, and made the rest of the journey in a somewhat more comfortable manner.

Commodore Chauncey had come from Lake Ontario to New-York during the winter, and had written to Captain Perry from that place to direct him to repair forthwith to Sackett's Harbour, where he was urgently desirous of seeing him. As the commodore had not yet arrived at Albany, Captain Perry determined to wait for him there, in order to be sooner made acquainted with his wishes. At the end of three days the commodore arrived at Albany. In the afternoon of the same day, being the twenty-eighth of February, Captain Perry set out for Sackett's Harbour, by direction of the commodore, who started at the same time, and arrived there on the evening of the third of March. The same night the alarm gun was fired to announce an attack. Captain Perry hastened on board the Madison, where he found the crew at their quarters, and everything in good order. The commodore, who had also arrived during the night, made his appearance soon after. The alarm had been occasioned by a sentinel's firing at a person who attempted to pass his post.

It had been rumored that an attack would be made on Sackett's Harbour, in order to destroy the squadron and the vessels on the stocks, so as to give the British the command of the lake during the approaching campaign. On this account Commodore Chauncey detained Captain Perry with him until the sixteenth of March, notwithstanding his extreme desire to be at his post superintending the construction of his squadron. After having once or twice suggested the propriety of his proceeding to his destination, the commodore at length told him that it was possible an attack might be made on the vessels in the harbour, in which case the commodore said he would like to have his assistance, and presumed he, Perry, would also wish to be there. This, Perry said, was conclusive.

On the sixteenth of March, however, he received orders to proceed to Erie, and hasten the equipment of the squadron then in process of construction there. On the twenty-fourth he arrived at Buffalo, and, after having passed a day in examining the navy-yard at Black Rock, then under the command of Lieutenant Pettigru, and made arrangements for having stores forwarded to Erie, he set out on the twenty-sixth in a sleigh, on the ice, for Erie. At Cattaraugus, where he passed the night, he learned from the keeper of the hotel in which he lodged that he had recently been on the Canada shore, where particular inquiries had been made as to the vessels to be constructed at Erie, and the force stationed there for their protection. The innkeeper inferred that an attempt would be made by the British to destroy the vessels when the ice should break up.

In the evening of the twenty-seventh Perry reached Erie, and immediately called around him the persons engaged in building and equipping the squadron. These were Mr. Noah Brown of New-York, the master shipwright, and sailing-master Dobbins, who superintended the construction by direction of Commodore Chauncey.<sup>1</sup> He found that the keels of the two twenty-gun brigs were laid, and that two gunboats were nearly planked; a third was ready also for planking. Captain Perry learned, equally to his astonishment and regret, that no arrangements had been made for bringing up such of the guns for the vessels as were to come from Buffalo and Black Rock, and that no orders on the subject had been received from the commodore. This was the more to be lamented, as the ice was already so weak as to render it impossible to bring them up on it, and the roads were impassable for heavy cannon. No preparations whatever had been made for the defence of these vessels had they been attacked; there was not a single musket or cartridge in the possession of the officer who had been in charge, or, in fact, in the village; and nothing would have been easier, nor, as it afterward proved, better worth attention, than for the enemy to have destroyed the vessels. A party of fifty carpenters, which had been sent on from Philadelphia, had not yet arrived, though they had been four weeks on their journey. The twenty-five who came on with Mr. Brown had made the journey in a fortnight. Captain Perry provided that very night for the most urgent of these wants, by hiring a guard of citizens to protect the vessels, which he organized and set on watch. He directed Mr. Dobbins to proceed to Buffalo on the following day, and bring on forty seamen from the navy-yard; also some muskets and cartridges, and, if possible, two twelve-pounders; and wrote, before going to rest, to the navy-agent in Pittsburgh, to hurry on the missing carpenters the moment they should appear, and to forward a number of articles required by the builder.

These deficiencies, and the distance from which they were to be supplied, convey a lively idea of the arduous nature of the undertaking with which Captain Perry had been intrusted; that of creating a squadron in this remote and thinly-peopled region. Mechanics, seamen, guns, sailcloth, almost everything necessary to the equipment of ships, had to be brought, at that season, a distance of five hundred miles, through a half-settled country, destitute of good roads, and but partially intersected by water communication. About one thousand pounds of iron was procured from Buffalo. The additional iron necessary for the construction of the vessels and for mounting their batteries was picked up by scraps in the neighbouring smithies, and welded together for the heavy work. Thus the pivot bolts of the carronades were made of three quarters of an inch iron. To perform the extra quantity of iron-work which the deficiency of large rods and bars occasioned, was attended with great difficulty. Five blacksmiths had been ordered from Philadelphia, and only two came, one of them being only a striker to the other. Fortunately, some blacksmiths were afterward found among the militia capable of doing the common work.

Although in our own country, we were, in fact, farther from our resources on the Lakes than the English. To be sure the ocean intervened for them; but the trouble of crossing it was as nothing to this laborious and most costly transportation. The power and ambition of England had long since accumulated in the Canadas every munition of war, while our frontier was entirely destitute of whatever was necessary for the construction or armament of ships. If the contest were now to be repeated, we should enter it with far greater ability to meet and overpower our opponents. While the facilities for the rapid transportation of the heaviest commodities have immeasurably increased, the development of the population, wealth, and power of our lake frontier would enable us to procure all the means of naval warfare on the spot. Ships ready built, and seamen to navigate them, steamers, and all the elements of maritime power, would be found ready for employment.

On the evening of the thirtieth of March, sailingmaster W. V. Taylor arrived from Sackett's Harbour with twenty officers and men. Captain Perry determined at once to leave Mr. Taylor in charge of the vessels at Erie, and proceed to Pittsburg in order to hasten on the carpenters, and procure some necessary stores which had not yet been obtained. He accordingly set out the next day, and arrived at Pittsburgh on the fourth of April. He immediately made arrangements for procuring canvass for the sails of his squadron from Philadelphia; for an unnecessary delay had been incurred in order to discover whether the canvass could not be procured at Pittsburgh. Captain Perry passed two days in visiting the workshops of the different mechanics employed in working for his squadron, and giving them minute directions as to the manner of preparing the articles that had been ordered, and with the manufacture of which they were wholly unacquainted. He also procured from Captain A. R. Woolley, the commissary of ordnance of the army, the loan of four small guns and some muskets for the defence of Erie, in case he should be disappointed in receiving those he had ordered from Buffalo; and this gentleman also kindly volunteered to superintend the casting of the shot which would be required for the squadron. He subsequently rendered great assistance in supplying military stores for the fleet, and received the warmest thanks of Perry. With regard to the carpenters, he found, to his annoyance, that, while they had passed on to Erie by land, their tools had been sent by water, and would not probably arrive so soon as they. The blockmakers from Philadelphia had also got separated from their tools, which had not yet arrived. Having urgently impressed on the various persons engaged in supplying articles for the squadron the necessity of having them finished by the first of May, he set out from Pittsburgh on the seventh of April, and reached Erie on the tenth. He found the vessels much advanced in their construction since his departure, but the muskets and cartridges which he had ordered from Buffalo had not arrived, as they could not be procured in that place. The forethought which had induced him to procure muskets and cannon at Pittsburgh, as an additional precaution for the defence of his vessels while building, was thus fully justified, and, ere long, he was able to prepare such ample means of resistance as to secure to the assailants a warm reception should they attempt the destruction of the vessels. At his earnest request, General Meade, the commanding officer in the neighbourhood, caused five hundred militia to be stationed at Erie to assist in its defence. Early in May the three gunboats were launched and equipped for service, and the two brigs, the keels of which were but just laid when Captain Perry arrived at Erie towards the close of March, were now nearly planked up, with the prospect of being ready to be launched in the course of three weeks. They were, in fact, launched on the twenty-fourth of May. The frames of the vessels were of white and black oak and chestnut, the outside planking of oak, and the decks of pine. The trees were cut down on the spot, sawed up, and often, on the same day, became part of the vessels. The brigs were one hundred and forty-one feet in their greatest length, thirty feet beam; they measured about five hundred tons each, and were pierced for twenty guns.

At this conjuncture Captain Perry made a sudden visit to Lake Ontario. The occasion which called him there, and the circumstances which attended his visit, are briefly and sententiously described in a copy of a letter, probably to his parents, left among his papers. As it is by far the most detailed account he has left of the affairs in which he took part, for he had an almost invincible aversion to the use of his pen, and as the whole document, and the actions which it describes, are strikingly characteristic of the man, we cannot offer a higher gratification to the reader than by transcribing it, or furnish him with a truer idea of the subject of this biography.

"On the evening of the twenty-third of May, I received information, about sunset, that Commodore Chauncey would in a day or two arrive at Niagara, when an attack would be made on Fort George. He had previously promised me the command of the seamen and marines that might land from the fleet. Without hesitation, I determined to join him. I left Erie about dark in a small four-oared open boat. The night was squally and very dark. After encountering head winds and many difficulties, I arrived at Buffalo on the evening of the twenty-fourth, refreshed, and remained there until daylight; I then passed the whole of the British lines in my boat within musket-shot. Passing Strawberry Island, several people on our side of the river hailed and beckoned me on shore. On landing, they pointed out about forty men on the end of Grand Island, who doubtless were placed there to intercept boats. In a few moments I should have been in their hands. I then proceeded with more caution. As we arrived at Schlosser it rained violently. No horse could be procured. I determined to push forward on foot; walked about two miles and a half, when the rain fell in such torrents I was obliged to take shelter in a house at hand. The sailors whom I had left with the boat, hearing of public horses on the commons, determined to catch one for me. They found an old pacing one which could not run away, and brought him in, rigged a rope from the boat into a bridle, and borrowed a saddle without either stirrup, girth, or crupper. Thus accoutred, they pursued me, and found me at the house where I had stopped. The rain ceasing, I mounted; my legs hung down the sides of the horse, and I was obliged to steady the saddle by holding by the mane. In this style I entered the camp, it raining again most violently. Colonel Porter being the first to discover me, insisted upon my taking his horse, as I had some distance to ride to the other end of the camp, off which the Madison lay.

"After innumerable difficulties, I reached the ship on the evening of the twenty-fifth, most unexpectedly to the commodore and all the officers of the squadron, who were assembled to receive orders. The commodore appeared delighted to see me, shook me cordially by the hand, and observed that 'no person on earth at that particular time could be more welcome.' This remark he more than once repeated. As soon as we were alone he informed me of all his plans. They were really judicious, and I had nothing to offer in addition. In the morning, the commodore and myself, in the pilot-boat schooner Lady of the Lake, reconnoitred the enemy's batteries with care and attention, and made the necessary arrangements for the disposition of the vessels of the squadron. We then called on General Dearborn, and the commodore urged the necessity of an attack the next morning, to which the general, who appears to place unlimited confidence in the commodore, immediately assented, and issued the general order, which you will find published in the Buffalo Gazette of the seventh of June, signed by Winfield Scott, adjutant-general. The last clause places the landing of the troops under the direction of Commodore Channcey. The commodore informed General Dearborn, as well as generals Lewis, Boyd, Chandler, and Winder, that this duty would be performed by me.

"In the afternoon the commodore asked me to go with him and see the different generals, and arrange the plan of debarkation. We met them together, when the commodore told them I was appointed to superintend the landing of the troops; with which they politely expressed their satisfaction. I asked the general if he would be so good as to explain how he wanted his men landed; in fact, to show me his order of battle. I then could arrange the boats so as to place the troops on shore at any given time or place. He said really he had no order of battle more than the general order; that he had only received that a few hours before, and had made no arrangements. I then endeavoured to show them the manner in which I thought the boats should be formed to land the troops with the most expedition, and so as to prevent loss; which was, with the advance guard in one line, the boats being separated fifty feet; each brigade formed in one line, with the same distance between the boats. By this means the fire of the enemy would not have such an effect as if the boats were in close order and in several lines. General Winder, who is their scientific man, had taken it into his head to advance with his brigade formed into three lines; and all the arguments the commodore and I could make use of could not convince him, although he said he would land as I might direct. Finding that they had no plan, that they hardly knew what they were going at, when we had taken leave, I observed to the commodore I did not wish to have anything to do with them, as no credit could be gained; the boats would be rowed by soldiers, who would know less than their generals, and that their misconduct, should any disaster happen, would attach to me. He agreed with me, and said he did not mean to place me in so awkward a situation; that they might get on shore as they could. I, at the same time, told him I would go in with the advanced guard, and assist Colonel Scott with my advice. Colonel M'Comb, who lives on board the ship with the commodore, and is really a soldier, and, at the same time, a modest man, came down from the general's quarters with us. Seeing me smile, he observed, 'I see you are amused to see what system and order our generals observe. I wish to God the commodore commanded the army as well as the navy!'

"It was eventually arranged that five hundred seamen and marines should be landed from the vessels, to be under my command, to act with Colonel M'Comb's regiment. The seamen were only to use the boarding-pike. Thus we had everything arranged on our part. At three in the morning we were called. It was calm, with a thick mist. At daylight the commodore directed the schooners to take the stations which had been previously assigned them as soon as possible, and commence a fire upon the enemy's batteries. At the same time, he asked me if I would go on shore, see General Lewis, hurry the embarkation, and bring the general off with me. This I did. I found that many of the troops had not yet got into their boats. General Lewis accompanied me on board the Madison. General Dearborn had gone on board previously. The ship was under way, with a light breeze from the eastward, quite fair for us; a thick mist hanging over Newark and Fort George, the sun breaking forth in the east, the vessels all under way, the lake covered with several hundred large boats, filled with soldiers, horses, and artillery, advancing towards the enemy, altogether formed one of the grandest spectacles I ever beheld. The breeze now freshened a little, which soon brought us opposite the town of Newark. The landing-place fixed upon was about two miles from the town, up the Niagara. The commodore, observing some of the schooners taking a wrong position, requested me to go in shore and direct them where to anchor. I immediately jumped into a small boat, and, in passing through the flat boats, I saw Colonel Scott, and told him I would be off to join him and accompany him on shore. When I got on board the Ontario, I found her situation and the Asp's, and directed them to be got under way and anchored at a place I pointed out to the commanding officers, where they could enfilade two forts. The enemy had no idea our vessels could come as near the shore as they did, many of them anchoring within half musket-shot. I pulled along the shore within musket-shot, and observed a situation where one of the schooners could act with great effect. I directed her commander to take it. This was so that he could play directly in the rear of the fort. On opening his fire, the consequence was such as I had imagined. The enemy could not stand to load their guns, and were obliged to leave the fort precipitately. I then pulled off to the ship, and, after conversing with the commodore and General Dearborn, and observing to the latter that the boats of the advanced guard were drifting to leeward very fast; that they would, if not ordered immediately to pull to windward, fall too far to leeward to be under cover of the schooners, and would take those in the rear still farther to leeward, he begged of me to go and get them to windward. I jumped into my boat and pulled for the advanced guard, took Colonel Scott into my boat, and, with much difficulty, we convinced the officers and soldiers of the necessity of keeping more to windward.

"As soon as we got them into a proper situation, I pulled ahead for the schooner nearest in shore, and the advanced guard pushed for the shore. On getting alongside of the schooner, the man at the masthead told me the whole British army was rapidly advancing for the point of landing. Knowing many of the officers had believed the British would not make a stand, and, as they could not be seen by the boats, being behind a bank, I pulled as quick as possible to give Scott notice, that his men might not be surprised by the opening of the enemy's fire. He was on the right and the schooner on the left. This obliged me to pull the whole length of the line, and, as the boats were in no regular order, I had to pull ahead of one and astern of another. Before I got up to Scott, although within a boat or two, the enemy appeared on the bank and gave us a volley. Nearly the whole of their shot went over our heads. Our troops appeared to be somewhat confused, firing without order and without aim. I was apprehensive they would kill each other, and hailed them to pull away for the shore, many of their boats having stopped rowing. They soon recovered, and pulled for the shore with great spirit. General Boyd led his brigade on in a very gallant manner, under a very heavy fire, it having suffered more severely than any other. Fortunately, the enemy, from apprehension of the fire from the schooners, kept back until our troops were within fifty yards of the shore; this deceived them, and their fire was thrown over our heads.

"I remained encouraging the troops to advance until the first brigade landed, when, observing the schooners did not fire briskly, from the apprehension of injuring our own troops, I went on board the Hamilton, of nine guns, commanded by Lieutenant Macpherson, and opened a tremendous fire of grape and canister. About the time I got on board the schooner, our troops had attempted to form on the bank; probably a hundred got up. They were obliged to retreat under the bank, where they were completely sheltered from the effect of the enemy's fire. The enemy could not stand the united effect of the grape and canister from the schooner, and of a well-directed fire from the troops, but broke and fled in great confusion, we plying them with round shot. Our troops then formed on the bank. General Lewis came on board the schooner from the ship at this time. After waiting a few moments, and observing the disposition of things on shore, he landed. I landed at the same time."

This document is suited to shed no little lustre on the fame of Perry, and to exhibit his conduct and character in a new and admirable light. It may also serve to show us what kind of generals we are likely again to have, if we abolish our present admirable nursery of officers in the military academy at West Point, and trust once more to Providence and inspiration in the hour of battle for the necessary insight into military affairs. It will also be observed, that the names of Scott and M'Comb, mentioned by Perry with approbation, became afterward well known to fame. We see from Perry's account, that, availing himself of a promise of Commodore Chauncey to give him the command of the seamen and marines on Lake Ontario in the event of a descent on the enemy's territory, and of a moment when his presence at Erie could be dispensed with, he set out, voluntarily and without an order, at a moment's warning, at the beginning of a dark and squally night, in a small boat, to make a voyage of near one hundred miles over an inland sea subject to violent tempests. Arrived at Buffalo, we find him pursuing his adventurous course down the Niagara River, within musket-shot of the enemy's territory, and, after abandoning his boat near the Rapids, pursuing his way through the wilderness which skirted the bank, alone, on foot, and during a violent storm. It was thus, when the means of being useful were within his reach, that he manifested the "ardent desire to meet the enemies of his country" which he had heretofore urged in his applications for active employment. The facts which he states with regard to his own movements during the attack on Fort George, show conclusively that its capture must have been in no inconsiderable degree owing to his indefatigable exertions in every quarter, his imperturbable calmness and presence of mind, and quick military perceptions. He seems to have exercised no control over the movements and disembarkation of the troops, as had been originally intended, from a hopelessness of procuring a concert of action on the part of the generals, and an unwillingness to bear the responsibility of failure. When, however, he discovered them falling into disorder, and drifting to leeward of the appointed landing-place, he pointed it out to the commanding general, and, forgetting his previous scruples, readily undertook, at his request, to remedy the evil. The ascendancy of a master mind was evident in the ready compliance which his directions met with, and in the way in which the soldiery rallied to his cries of encouragement. Invested at once with the authority of the general and commodore, and guided by the inspiration of an intuitive military conception, we find him hastily remodelling the order of the boats when in contact with the enemy, stationing anew the vessels where their fire would be most destructive, directing it in person, and flitting from point to point, wherever the circumstances of the day were critical or danger imminent. Commodore Chauncey, in his official report of the naval operations of the day, did ample justice to the services of Captain Perry, in joining him from Erie and volunteering his services; acknowledged the great assistance he had received from him in superintending the debarcation of the troops, and said of him, in conclusion, that "he was present at every point where he could be useful, under showers of musketry, but fortunately escaped unhurt."

The capture of Fort George was attended by important consequences. It led almost immediately to the evacuation, by the British, of their whole frontier on the Niagara. Both banks being now in our possession, we were left in complete control of the navigation of the river. One of the fruits of this advantage was, that Captain Perry could now remove into Lake Erie five small vessels belonging to the government, which hitherto had been detained at Black Rock by the enemy's batteries on the Canada shore. He was despatched on this service by Commodore Chauncey on the twenty-eighth of May, with a party of officers and fifty seamen. The vessels had recently been fitted for service by Mr. Eckford, the naval constructor on Lake Ontario. One of them was the Caledonia, which Lieutenant Elliott had surprised and taken from the enemy some months before. The others had been purchased by him, in a situation where they could only become of use in the event of the enemy being driven from the opposite shore. This event, which could have been by no means certain, having actually occurred, Captain Perry was now able to remove these vessels into Lake Erie. The task, though unopposed by the enemy, was, however, one of no little difficulty. He was obliged to drag the vessels most laboriously against the current of the Niagara, which varied in strength from five to seven knots, by the aid of oxen and the exertions of his seamen, assisted by two hundred soldiers, under the command of captains Brevoort and Young, lent by General Dearborn to assist in defending and navigating the vessels to Erie.

Having taken on board all the stores in the navy-yard at Black Rock, the vessels were tracked up the current; a toilsome task, which occupied near a fortnight, and of which, in writing to Commodore Chauncey, he pronounced the fatigue "almost incredible." On the evening of the fourteenth of June, he set sail from Buffalo for Erie. His little squadron consisted of the brig Caledonia, of three long twenty-four's, the schooners Somers, of two long thirty-two's, Tigress and Ohio, of one twenty-four pounder each, and the sloop Trippe, of one long thirty-two. The enemy having several years before commenced the creation of a naval force on Lake Erie, had, at the time, the complete command of the lake, on which it possessed a commissioned force more than six times greater than that with which Captain Perry was about to proceed to Erie in order to join the vessels in process of equipment there. The British force on the lake was commanded by Captain Finnis, a commander in the royal navy, and consisted of the ship Queen Charlotte, of four hundred tons and seventeen guns, the schooner Lady Prevost, of two hundred and thirty tons, mounting thirteen guns, the brig Hunter, of ten guns, the schooners Little Belt of three guns, and Chippeway, of one gun. To remove our insignificant flotilla from Buffalo to Erie, in the face of such an overpowering force, was a task of difficulty, requiring no little vigilance and address. By a skilful display of these qualities, Captain Perry succeeded, though narrowly watched, opposed by contrary winds, and suffering from serious indisposition, in getting his vessels past the enemy and safely into the harbour of Erie, off which the enemy hove in sight as he was going in on the evening of the eighteenth.<sup>2</sup> The British squadron and our flotilla had been in sight together during the day from Chatauque, about twenty miles from Erie; but the insignificance of our vessels had enabled them to pass unobserved.

The business of equipping the squadron now went rapidly forward; but, as yet, only one hundred and ten officers and men had arrived, including those brought up by the flotilla.

On Perry's arrival at Erie he found a letter from the secretary of the navy, highly complimentary of his conduct in the landing at Fort George, and of his exertions in preparing the force on Lake Erie. In reply, while he expressed a becoming sense of the responsibility of his situation, and doubts of his capacity to meet the expectation of the government, Perry assured the secretary of his ardent desire to possess the favourable opinion of the government and of his countrymen, and that no diligence or exertion of which he was capable should be wanting to promote the honour of the service. He informed the secretary that one of the brigs was completely rigged and had her battery mounted, the other would be equally far advanced in a week; the sails of both vessels were nearly completed, and, on the arrival of the shot and anchors from Pittsburgh, from which they were confidently expected soon, all the vessels would be ready for service in one day after the reception of the crews.

From fatigue and exposure in getting his flotilla from Black Rock to Buffalo, and want of rest while passing the enemy on the lake, added to the effects of the climate, Captain Perry now became still more seriously indisposed. Many of his men were in the same condition. Writing to the commodore on the twenty-seventh of June, he tells him, "from sickness and other causes, we cannot muster more than fifty or sixty men who are of any service to us; these work almost day and night." Fortunately, Perry soon recovered sufficiently to attend to his urgent duties, though his health continued feeble while he remained on the lakes, and his exertions, of course, the more laborious. Of the fifty sick at this time, a considerable portion were the wounded and infirm from Black Rock. He considered thirty out of his one hundred and ten men not only entirely useless at the time, but likely to continue so.

On the tenth of July Captain Perry received a letter from General Dearborn, stating that he had explicit directions from the secretary of war to order the detachment of two hundred soldiers under Captain Brevoort, which had been lent to the squadron on Lake Erie, to return to Fort George, and requesting that they might be immediately sent to him. At the same time, he kindly offered that Captain Brevoort might remain attached to the squadron, if it were agreeable both to Captain Perry and to himself, as his familiarity with the navigation of Lake Erie and the upper Lakes might render him peculiarly useful. Captain Brevoort had been more than a year employed in navigating the brig Adams, employed by the war department in the transportation of military stores. This vessel had been captured by the British at Detroit, and called by them after the place where she was taken. The detachment was accordingly sent to Buffalo on the following day, under Captain Younge; and the boats which took the party down were left to bring up the officers and men, now so anxiously expected from Lake Ontario, to man the squadron. Captain Brevoort remained to command the marines of the Niagara. To supply, in some measure, the deficiency occasioned by the withdrawal of the soldiers, Lieutenant J. Brooks, of the marine corps, was occupied in recruiting at Erie. He had previously brought on a small detachment recruited by him in Pittsburgh, and eventually succeeded in enlisting thirty marines.

On the twelfth of July Perry received and communicated to his officers the official news of the capture of the Chesapeake, and the death of her gallant commander and a number of his officers, together with the customary order to wear mourning. There had been much, however, in the quenchless heroism of Lawrence to sooth the painful feelings and gratify the pride of his countrymen. In his dying injunction, "Don't give up the ship," he bequeathed a watchword which was yet to herald them to victory. That his memory was not coupled with discouragement was soon after evinced by an order from the navy department to give his name to one of the brigs; and that which Perry had fixed on for his own was called the Lawrence. The other was called the Niagara.

Only five days after being called upon to relinquish the two hundred men which constituted the main force of his squadron, he received instructions to co-operate with General Harrison, commander-in-chief of the northwestern army, in support of the military movements which he was making for the recovery of the territory of Michigan, and the invasion of Upper Canada. This order of the secretary's presupposed that the squadron at Lake Erie was ready for active service; and, of course, the issue of the necessary orders on the part of the government for officering and manning the squadron. These had actually been given to Commodore Chauncey, who commanded on Lake Erie as well as Lake Ontario, and the necessary officers and men placed at his disposal; but so absorbed was he in the interest of his immediate command, that the officers and men sent to him for distribution throughout the naval force subject to his orders, were retained almost exclusively where he was himself present. It seems to have been his intention to detain the crews until the vessels on Lake Erie were ready to sail, in the hope of being able, in the mean time, to overpower the enemy on Lake Ontario, and then repeat the same process in person on Lake Erie. But, independently of the disadvantage of keeping officers and men strangers to each other and to the vessels in which they were to sail until the moment they were to be engaged, it was expecting almost a miracle that the vessels should be equipped in so short a time by such a small number of men. But, strange as it may seem, by the unremitting zeal and exertions of the youthful commander, destitute almost entirely of subordinate officers, such as boatswains and gunners, and attending personally to the minutest details; and by the unceasing efforts of a handful of men, reduced by sickness both in numbers and strength, and sadly overworked, yet strangers to murmuring and almost without an attempt to desert, the vessels were now rigged, armed, and ready for service. A considerable part of the shot had arrived from Pittsburgh; the anchors, which had not yet been received, were confidently expected in a week. On the day that Perry received these orders to co-operate with General Harrison, he wrote to Commodore Chauncey to communicate them, and expressed his confident assurance that the squadron would be ready, in all other respects, for service so soon as the necessary men could reach him. "I cannot," he says, "express to you the anxiety I feel respecting them." He also stated his great desire to have the services of the officers who were to join him, and especially of the commander of the second brig.

Having received an intimation that the men would soon be on their way—for he heard very seldom from Commodore Chauncey, and was chiefly indebted to rumour for a knowledge of his movements—he despatched a sailing-master to Buffalo on the eighteenth of July, with two boats, to be joined to the two which had been sent down with the detachment of troops, and with such others as could be procured, sufficient in number to bring up three hundred and fifty men, which was the number which Captain Perry expected from Lake Ontario to complete his crews. The officer was directed to use great vigilance in returning with the men, on account of the enemy's squadron, which was almost daily in sight off Erie, and might be considered as blockading the port; he was to keep close in shore, and call at two designated rendezvous, Chataouque and the Twenty-mile Creek, by the way, in order to receive instructions for his government. About this time we find him informing General Harrison, on the nineteenth of July, that he had at that date one hundred and twenty officers and men fit for duty, and more than fifty on the sick list.

On the nineteenth of July Captain Perry received a second order from the secretary of the navy, evidently written under the belief that the squadron was manned, to co-operate with General Harrison. He had also received repeated communications from General Harrison with regard to his own critical situation, setting forth the important relief that the co-operation of the squadron would afford him, and urging the favourableness of the moment to strike a blow at the enemy's squadron before he should launch his new ship, the Detroit, which would turn the balance, and give the enemy a considerable superiority. The enemy had quite recently been strengthened by the arrival of Captain Barclay, a very distinguished officer, who had served under Nelson, and been with him at Trafalgar, to assume the chief command. He had also brought a number of experienced officers and a party of prime seamen. Still our squadron was for the moment superior in number of guns, and the vessels being now ready for service, had the crews been at hand, might have gone out with a confident hope of capturing the enemy. This hope Captain Perry expressed to the secretary of the navy in reply. He mentioned that the enemy were then off the harbour, and that, the moment a sufficient number of men arrived, he would be able to sail, and trusted that the issue of the contest would be favourable. He could only state to the secretary that he had but one hundred and twenty men fit for service, in addition to fifty sick; and offer to General Harrison the same reason for his inability to co-operate with him. The situation of Captain Perry, and the bitter mortification which it occasioned him, can be best learned from the following urgent friendly appeal to the feelings of Commodore Chauncey.

"Dear Sir,

"The enemy's fleet of six sail are now off the bar of this harbour. What a golden opportunity if we had men! Their object is no doubt either to blockade or attack us, or to carry provisions and re-enforcements to Malden. Should it be to attack us, we are ready to meet them. I am constantly looking to the eastward; every mail and every traveller from that quarter is looked to as the harbinger of the glad tidings of our men being on their way. I am fully aware how much your time must be occupied with the important concerns of the other lake. Give me men, sir, and I will acquire both for you and myself honour and glory on this lake, or perish in the attempt. Conceive my feelings; an enemy within striking distance, my vessels ready, and not men enough to man them. Going out with those I now have is out of the question. You would not suffer it were you here. I again ask you to think of my situation; the enemy in sight, the vessels under my command more than sufficient, and ready to make sail, and yet obliged to bite my fingers with vexation for want of men. I know, my dear sir, full well, you will send me the crews for the vessels as soon as possible; yet a day appears an age. I hope that the wind or some other cause will delay the enemy's return to Malden until my men arrive, and I will have them."

Two days after this letter was written, the enemy were becalmed off the harbour. Captain Perry immediately pulled out with three gunboats to endeavour to annoy them. He was only able to exchange a few shots with them, one of which struck the mizzenmast of the Queen Charlotte, when a breeze springing up, they stood off. On the twenty-third of July Captain Perry received another communication from the secretary of the navy, urging upon him the importance of capturing or destroying the enemy's squadron. Captain Perry replied that he was fully aware of the importance of this object. That his ships were ready, but that he was without crews. He told the secretary that he could not describe to him the mortification which his situation occasioned him. Had the secretary, who had been so often informed of Captain Perry's deficiencies in this respect, ceased to depend upon the circuitous and reluctant transmission of seamen from Lake Ontario, after they had undergone what was familiarly known as "a Sackett's Harbour examination," he might have sent any number of officers and seamen direct from Philadelphia in less time than they could be forwarded from Sackett's Harbour. A little self-dependence, and a determination which would have cost but a moment's reflection and the dash of a pen on the part of the secretary, would have saved all this trouble and delay, and the jeopardy of important national interests. But the history of no country could possibly furnish more abundant instances of official imbecility and mismanagement than ours. This has ever been most apparent in whatever relates to the navy.

At length on the twenty-third of July, Captain Perry received a reinforcement of seventy men and officers, and immediately wrote in the following friendly terms to Commodore Chauncey:

"My Dear Sir,

"I have this moment had the very great pleasure of receiving yours by Mr. Champlin, with the seventy men. The enemy are now off this harbour with the Queen Charlotte, Lady Prevost, Chippeway, Erie, and Friend's Good Will.<sup>2</sup> My vessels are all ready; for God's sake, and yours, and mine, send me men and officers, and I will have them all in a day or two. Commodore Barclay keeps just out of the reach of our gunboats. I am not able to ship a single man at this place. I shall try for volunteers for our cruise. Send on the commander, my dear sir, for the Niagara. She is a noble vessel. Woolsey, Brown, or Elliott I should like to see amazingly.<sup>3</sup> I am very deficient in officers of every kind. Send me officers and men and honour is within our grasp. The vessels are all ready to meet the enemy the moment they are officered and manned. Our sails are bent, provisions on board, and, in fact, everything is ready. Barclay has been bearding me for several days; I long to have at him. However anxious I am to reap the reward of the labour and anxiety I have had on this station, I shall rejoice, whoever commands, to see this force on the lake, and surely I had rather be commanded by my friend than by any other. Come, then, and the business is decided in a few hours. Barclay shows no disposition to avoid the

This was, indeed, a touching appeal to the generosity of Chauncey, which might well have been awakened by that which Perry displayed in tendering to him the fruits of his exertions, a triumph prepared by his own unparalleled toils and unceasing anxiety. Though Lake Erie was as much within the command of Commodore Chauncey as Lake Ontario, he did not probably like to leave his more extensive command on Lake Ontario, in the presence of an active and ingenious enemy. Otherwise he might easily have repaired to Lake Erie with such a re-enforcement of officers and men as would have secured his triumph on that lake, and subsequently brought back with him the means of obtaining a second triumph on Lake Ontario. Commodore Chauncey did indeed intend to assume in person the command of the force on Lake Erie, but postponed the time until after he should have first beaten the enemy on Lake Ontario. A consideration of the state of the war on our northern and northwestern frontier at this particular period might well authorize the opinion that Commodore Chauncey would have been justified in taking advantage of Perry's generous offer, conceived in the true spirit of patriotism and devotion to the welfare of his country, and repairing to Lake Erie with a sufficient force of officers and men to decide the contest for superiority immediately in our favour. The fate of General Harrison's army was entirely dependant upon that of our squadron on Lake Erie. The British, being victorious by land and water on our northwestern frontier, would have found themselves at once at the head of our great navigable rivers, in a situation to descend into the heart of our country, and give it over to devastation and all the horrors of savage warfare, from which the territory of Michigan was then fatally suffering. Had Commodore Chauncey left Lake Ontario temporarily, his successor could have imitated the defensive policy hitherto pursued by the enemy. In the interest of the fame of Perry, we cannot but rejoice that Commodore Chauncey should have declined repairing to Lake Erie. Had he gone, it could scarcely have been better for the country—it would have been sadly in abatement of the fame of Perry.

About this time, a concentration of the enemy's troops about Long Point, which lies opposite to Erie on the Canada shore, at a distance of only thirty miles, and the disappearance of the British squadron in the same direction, led to the belief than an attack on Erie was intended, with a view to the capture or destruction of Perry's squadron before the arrival of his crews, and of the military stores collected at Erie to be embarked on board of the squadron for the use of the northwestern army. Captain Perry called on Major-general Meade of the militia for a re-enforcement of troops, and made every necessary preparation for the reception of the enemy. The officers were all kept on board, and boats rowed guard throughout the night. Great consternation prevailed among the villagers, who hastened to send their families and valuables to the interior. Perry acquainted the secretary of the navy and the commodore with the fact of his being menaced with an attack, and having taken measures to repel it, assuring them that he had no fears for the vessels, even if the enemy should get possession of the town, which he considered unlikely. It was subsequently known from Commodore Barclay that an attack had, in fact, been at this time contemplated and matured, but failed through the want of a sufficient sustaining force of troops at the proper moment.

On the twenty-seventh of July, Captain Perry received a letter by express from assistant adjutant-general Holmes, informing him, by order of General Harrison, that the enemy had invested Fort Meigs a second time with a heavy force. He stated that the presence of the enemy's squadron off Erie was considered most unfortunate, unless Captain Perry should be able to either fight or elude it; and that he was directed to recommend it, as the general's opinion, that it should be Captain Perry's great object to cooperate immediately with the army by sailing up Lake Erie. If this co-operation could be effected, the enemy would be compelled either to retreat precipitately, or suffer the ultimate necessity of surrendering. The adjutant-general concluded his letter as follows: "I feel great pleasure in conveying to you an assurance of the general's perfect conviction that no exertion will be omitted on your part to give the crisis an issue of profit and glory to the arms of our country."<sup>5</sup>

Here was new evidence of the importance attached to his early co-operation with the northwestern army, and of the responsibility which weighed upon him; new stimulus to his ardent desire to meet the enemy, and new subject for mortification, that, while supposed everywhere to be ready to act, and pressed on all sides to put forth on the lake, he was yet unable to move for want of men. He mentioned to the general, in reply, his inexpressible mortification at his deficiency of officers and men; stated that he had, some days before, sent an express to Commodore Chauncey, urging him to send the crews immediately; and that he had now forwarded him a copy of the general's letter, accompanied by a still more urgent request to the same effect.

His urgent letter to Commodore Chauncey was in the following words; and it is interesting, inasmuch as it drew from the commodore a reply which occasioned Perry to request to be removed from Lake Erie:

"Sir,

"I have this moment received by express the enclosed letter from General Harrison. If I had officers and men, and I have no doubt you will send them, I could fight the enemy, and proceed up the lake. But, having no one to command the Niagara, and only one commissioned lieutenant and two acting lieutenants, whatever my wishes may be, going out is out of the question. The men that came by Mr. Champlin are a motley set, blacks, soldiers, and boys. I cannot think you saw them after they were selected. I am, however, pleased to see anything in the shape of a man."

On the thirtieth of July he received from Lake Ontario an additional re-enforcement of sixty officers and men. Two days after he opened a rendezvous for landsmen, to serve four months, or until after a decisive battle, at ten dollars a month. He thus carried the total of his force, after landing the confirmed invalids, to about three hundred officers and men, to man two twenty-gun brigs and eight smaller vessels, mounting together fifteen guns, and making an aggregate of fifty-five guns. These men were, moreover, in general, of the most inferior description, constituting the refuse of all that had arrived on Lake Ontario; many of them debilitated by recent disease, and more than a fifth of them incapacitated by fevers and dysentery from any duty. With regard to officers, the above letter to Commodore Chauncey shows how deficient he was. In fact, he stated to the secretary of the navy, in a letter of the thirtieth of July, that he had not sufficient officers of experience even to navigate the vessels. Nevertheless, in view of the critical situation of the northwestern army, and of all that was expected from him by those who were unacquainted with his deficiencies; stimulated by his impatience under the daily "bearding" of Commodore Barclay, who was almost perpetually in sight, with his colours displayed in defiance; and beginning, perhaps, to have more doubt than he had expressed that Commodore Chauncey would send him the deficient officers and men, he determined to set sail with those that he had, and such volunteers as he could procure from the army, and put all to the issue of a battle, which he was especially anxious should be fought before the enemy's squadron should be re-enforced by his new and heavy ship the Detroit, which had been launched on the seventeenth of July, and might soon be expected to appear on the lake, and which would give to the enemy a great superiority in tonnage as well as in number of guns.

In estimating the hardihood of Perry's determination to fight at once with a squadron but half manned with the worst materials, and these half crews farther reduced by sickness, we must also take into consideration that there could have been but little leisure for exercising the guns or training the boarders, pikemen, sail-trimmers, and firemen to the various duties essential to the offensive and defensive operations of a naval engagement. When the able-bodied men of the squadron were kept working incessantly almost by day and night, humanity, as well as the duty of preserving them from utter exhaustion, forbade any exertion, however essential, not connected with the urgent occupations of the moment. Still opportunity had been found, during the last few days that the squadron remained within the harbour of Erie, to station the crews carefully at quarters, and to give them a general idea of all their duties. During several hours of each of these days the men were exercised thoroughly at the guns, and Perry went round in person to see that each man understood his peculiar duty; that the evolutions for loading and firing were properly performed; the arrangements perfect for passing powder without risk or confusion; and that the tubes, matches, and powder-horns were in readiness for service. The commander who delegates these duties to others, who fails to attend in person to whatever concerns the fighting department of his vessel, may fatally regret his misplaced confidence in the hour of battle.

LAKE ERIE, about to become the scene of great national events, had hitherto been only navigated by our countrymen in pursuit of commerce. The canoe of the savage or the light bark of the trader had almost alone traversed its hitherto peaceful surface. But now war was to visit it, and the solitudes of nature, as yet accustomed only to reverberate the thunders of Heaven, were to be disturbed by the more terrible engines of human wrath. The American Fur Company had, in recent years, constructed one or two vessels for the purpose of transporting the articles which it trafficked with the Indians for peltries to the head of navigation at the upper lakes, and bringing down its valuable returns. These vessels had a slight armament. The Northwestern Company, on the other side of the lake, had also armed vessels of considerable size. More recently, the British government had built several vessels, especially intended for cruisers, to give them the command of the lake in the event of a war with the United States. The Queen Charlotte had been built with this view as early as 1808, and some of the small vessels at an earlier period. These vessels were originally manned with provincial seamen, and officered likewise by provincials belonging to a special corps disconnected from the royal navy. They had cruised a good deal on the lake, were familiar with its coasts, and practised in the management of their vessels. In several trifling encounters, and particularly in annoying General Hull's army while in Canada, this provincial force had exhibited great skill and enterprise.

With regard to this new arena of naval warfare almost in the heart of the wilderness, it may be well briefly to state that the lake is about two hundred and eighty miles long from the outlet of the Miami to the Falls of Niagara, with a breadth varying from fifteen to sixty miles, and a depth scarcely anywhere exceeding twenty fathoms. Its shores are generally sandy or rock-bound, and therefore dangerous to the navigator. On the northern shore, the extraordinary course of the Thames River, running nearly parallel to the course of the lake, at no great distance and in the contrary direction to its current, cuts off all the streams, and accounts for the almost total absence on that side of inlets and harbours. On the American side the harbours are more numerous, but all of them have bars except that of Put-in Bay in the Bass Islands, which is accessible for vessels drawing twelve feet. At the mouth of the Sandusky there was a pretty good harbour, but that at Erie was much better. Its comparative proximity, moreover, to the populous portion of Pennsylvania, and especially the great manufacturing town of Pittsburgh, between which and the neighbourhood of Erie there was an almost uninterrupted, though tedious, water communication by the Alleghany and its tributaries, gave it great advantages for the equipment of a naval force. Besides, being situated towards the center of the lake, which became broad at that point, it rendered the squadron less exposed to a surprise and destruction by the enemy than it would have been at Buffalo, which, in fact, was taken and burned in the course of the war. Buffalo, too, at that time had no good harbour, that which now exists there being almost entirely a work of art. Erie, on the contrary, had a beautiful natural harbour, consisting of a bay, very narrow at the entrance, but expanding into a spacious sheet of water within. This bay is formed by a peninsula, extending in the form of a crab's claw in a northeasterly direction along the shore of the lake. From this remarkable point of land, the place had received from the French its previous name of Presquisle. Across the mouth there was a bar, extending lakeward upward of a mile, and varying in depth in the channel from six feet at the shoalest part to ten feet. The shoal, being formed of light sand, was liable to be affected by gales of wind, which occasioned it frequently to vary, and sometimes reduced the depth as low as five and even four feet.

This bar, being too shoal for the enemy to cross it with his vessels equipped and armed, had offered great protection to our squadron from attack during its construction and equipment. Now, however, that the squadron was ready to sail, it became a serious impediment, inasmuch as it would be indispensable to raise the two brigs bodily at least four feet higher than their usual draught of nine feet, in order to enable them to pass the bar. This, of course, could only be done by the removal of their armament, and in smooth water; and as it was within the option of the enemy's commander then blockading the port, as it was surely his interest, to attack our squadron at disadvantage while engaged in crossing the bar, partially divested of its armament, and in the perplexity and embarrassment of laborious efforts unfavorable to defence, Captain Perry surely expected to be engaged by the enemy while in the act of removing his vessels to the open lake. That he did so is evident from the conclusion of a letter to the secretary of the navy, dated on the twenty-seventh of July, in which he says, "We are ready to sail the instant officers and men arrive; and, as the enemy appear determined to dispute the passage of the bar with us, the question as to the command of the lake will soon be decided." The measures adopted by Captain Perry in meeting this trying and dangerous emergency were of the most judicious character, and equally creditable to his distinguished skill as a seaman, and to his military genius and hardihood. Two large camels, or scows, of sufficient capacity to displace a given quantity of water, and lift the brigs four feet after the removal of their armament, had been previously constructed by Mr. Brown, to fit exactly the shape of the brigs, and, enclosing them at the bow and stern, to meet towards the center. A water-battery of three long twelves had also been mounted on the beach, opposite the shoalest part of the bar, to assist in the protection of the vessels while in the act of crossing.

Meantime, the enemy continued in the offing, displaying his colours, with a commodore's broad pendant at the main of the Queen Charlotte; from which it appears that our opponents, though so far from the scene of action, were not guilty of the absurdity of making their commander on Lake Erie wholly subordinate to the commander on Lake Ontario. On the second of August Commodore Barclay suddenly withdrew his vessels, and stood out of sight in the direction of the Canada shore. They were still absent on the morning of Sunday, the first of August,<sup>1</sup> when the commodore weighed with eight of his squadron, and beat down to near the bar in readiness for crossing. About to undertake with such slender means an object of so much national importance, Perry, who had ever a deep sense of our dependance on a controlling and overruling Providence, now invoked protection and aid from the God of battles. A clergyman, whose ministration he had attended on shore, came off by invitation to the Lawrence; and, the officers of the squadron being assembled, the banner of the cross was raised high above the ensign, and the sacred offices commenced. The man of God plead devoutly for the triumph of our just cause; for our success in wresting the tomahawk and scalping-knife from savage hands, and subduing the ruthless foe who had encouraged and armed them for the slaughter. He then, in an appropriate address, set forth all the motives of humanity, of patriotism, of what depended on them for the rescuing of outraged altars and the diffusion of Christianity, and bade them go forth conquering and to conquer. The feelings of all were affected and elevated by the solemn rites, and the contemplative mind of Perry seemed confirmed in its calm and steadfast enthusiasm.

In the afternoon Major-general Meade, of the militia, who had lent all the aid in his power in the defence and equipment of the squadron, visited the Lawrence with his suite, and was received with a salute of fifteen guns. Throughout the day a great concourse of people from the neighbouring country, scarcely any of whom had ever before seen a square-rigged vessel, lined the shore of the lake, filled with astonishment at the strangeness of the spectacle.

Early in the morning of Monday the second, Perry ordered five of the small vessels to cross the bar, anchor without it, and clear for action; the sixth, with the Niagara, to anchor one on each side of the channel close within the bar, and spring their broadsides lakeward, in readiness to open on the enemy, should they appear, and cover the passage of the Lawrence. The vessels had been towed to the bar, when, to the great annoyance of Captain Perry, he found that the lake was considerably below its usual level; that there was only four feet water on the bar instead of six, and that it would be necessary to lighten even the small vessels to get them over. Still, the smoothness of the lake and the absence of the enemy induced him to proceed. While the small vessels were getting over, the guns of the Lawrence, with the exception of one or two to assist in her defence, were hoisted out, with their charges in them, and placed in boats, which were dropped astern. The camels were then got alongside, and the water allowed to run into them until their tops were nearly level with the surface. The camels were then lashed together, and solid blocks arranged on top of them, so as to reach the ends of stout spars which had been laid across the Lawrence through her ports, and securely lashed down to the frame of the vessel. This being arranged, the pumps were set at work in the scows, which raised gradually, lifting the brig with them as the water was discharged. In this way the Lawrence was lifted three feet, which, with what she had raised on the removal of her armament, reduced her draught to about four feet. When she got on the shoalest part of the bar, however, it was found that the water had still shoaled, and that it was impossible to force her over, notwithstanding every exertion that could be made by heaving on the cables and anchors which had been carried out. The Lawrence had settled a little from the slacking of the lashings and giving way of one of the spars which passed from camel to camel. It became, therefore, indispensable to sink the camels again, get additional blocks between them and the cross-pieces, and replace the broken one. This expedient was resorted to towards nightfall; a few inches diminution of the Lawrence's draught was thus gained, and she was slowly and by main strength hove across the bar in the course of that night and the following day. In this laborious service efficient aid was received from the militia of the neighbourhood, under the orders of General David Meade.

Daylight of the fourth of August found the Lawrence's crew, with most of those of the other vessels, still hard at work. She got fairly afloat at eight o'clock, and her guns were quickly mounted, and everything prepared for action. The Niagara was got over more easily on the following day ; but was still on the bar when the enemy appeared in the offing, standing in with a leading breeze. Encouraged by their young commander, and excited by his appeals to their pride and patriotism, the exhausted seamen rallied to the call, and, by unparalleled exertions, the Niagara was in deep water at eleven o'clock. To gain time while engaged in the task of mounting her battery, Perry now gave orders to Lieutenant Packett, of the Ariel, and sailing-master Champlain, of the Scorpion, both their vessels being fast-sailing schooners, to weigh anchor and stand out towards the enemy, and annoy him with their heavy guns at long shot. These officers obeyed instantly, and dashed directly at the enemy, and opened a fire on him in the most gallant manner. Meantime the Lawrence remained at anchor, and the people being at quarters, commenced exercising the guns, when it became apparent that they were not yet to be called on to use them in earnest. It does not appear to have been Commodore Barclay's intention to take advantage of the critical situation of our squadron in crossing the bar to bring on an engagement, as Captain Perry had expected. If it had been, he would hardly have been turned from his purpose by this slight, though well-timed and well-executed demonstration, nor yet by the judicious and admirable disposition which Captain Perry had made to cover the inevitable weakness of his position while crossing the bar. His motive for neglecting this favourable opportunity for attack was doubtless the certainty which he felt that in a fortnight he should have the co-operation of his heavy ship the Detroit, which would give him, in every respect, a decided superiority. Whatever may have been his motives, and they were no doubt worthy of a brave man, after a short cannonade with the two schooners, he bore up with his squadron, and stood across the lake in the direction of Long Point.<sup>2</sup>

In the midst of these anxious operations, Captain Perry had received another urgent letter from General Harrison, inviting the early co-operation of his squadron. He instantly replied to it in the following words: "I have had the honour to receive your letter of the twenty-eighth of July this morning, and hasten, in reply, to inform you that I have succeeded in getting one of the sloops-of-war over the bar. The other will probably be over to-day or to-morrow. The enemy is now standing for us with five sail. We have seven over the bar; all small, however, except the Lawrence. I am of opinion that in two days the naval superiority will be decided on this lake. Should we be successful, I shall sail for the head of the lake immediately to co-operate with you, and hope that our joint efforts will be productive of honour and advantage to our country. The squadron is not much more than half manned; but, as I see no prospect of receiving reinforcements, I have determined to commence my operations. I have requested Captain Richardson<sup>3</sup> to despatch an express to you the moment the issue of our contest with the enemy is known. My anxiety to join you is very great, and, had seamen been sent to me in time, I should now, in all probability, have been at the head of the lake, acting in conjunction with you." In a postscript he adds, "Thank God, the other sloop-of-war is over. I shall be after the enemy, who is now making off, in a few hours. I shall be with you shortly."

During the remainder of the fifth of August and the whole of the following night, the crews of the different vessels were busily engaged in getting on board and distributing a few necessary stores, receiving volunteers from the militia, and preparing the vessels for sailing and for battle. At three o'clock in the morning of the sixth, the signal was made for the squadron to weigh anchor, and at four the vessels were all under sail, standing for Long Point, the direction in which the enemy had been last seen. The earnest desire of Perry to meet the enemy may be judged from his indefatigable and unceasing efforts to get his vessels over the bar, to prepare them for battle, and go in pursuit of the enemy. His ardour was warmly shared by his officers and men. From daylight on the second to the fourth of August, Perry, though in weak health, had not closed his eyes, and not an officer or man in that squadron had enjoyed a moment's rest, except such as could be snatched upon deck. During the search for the enemy the vessels were cleared for action, and there could have been little opportunity for repose. After an ineffectual pursuit of twenty-four hours, the enemy having, as it afterward proved, proceeded to Malden, at the head of the lake, the squadron returned to its anchorage off Erie, having barely been able to fetch that place. Had the wind favoured, the commodore intended to have followed the enemy to the head of the lake.<sup>4</sup>

The seventh and eighth of August were employed in filling up with provisions, and receiving the military stores for the army of General Harrison. It was the intention of Captain Perry to have put to sea on the evening of the eighth, on his way up the lake; but in the course of the day he received an express from Lieutenant Elliott, dated at

Cattaraugus, sixty miles lower down the lake, informing Captain Perry that he had reached that place on his way to join the squadron and take the command of the Niagara, together with two acting lieutenants, eight midshipmen, a master-mate, a clerk, and eighty-nine men, making a reenforcement of one hundred and two souls in all.<sup>5</sup>

This pleasing announcement is thus noticed in Mr. Hambleton's journal, and is interesting as giving a lively picture of the position and feelings of Perry. "We went on shore and transacted a variety of business; paid off the volunteers, so that we have none but the four months' men who signed articles. Captain Perry has just received a letter from General Harrison, informing him of the raising of the siege of Camp Meigs, and of the unsuccessful attack on the fort at Sandusky, commanded by Lieutenant Craughan. The prisoners taken there state that the new ship Detroit was launched at Malden on the seventeenth of last month. Captain Perry and I dined on shore. After dinner being alone, we had a long conversation on the state of our affairs. He confessed that he was now much at a loss what to do. While he feels the danger of delay, he is not insensible to the hazard of encountering an enemy without due preparation. His officers are few and inexperienced, and we are short of seamen. His repeated and urgent requests for men having been treated with the most mortifying neglect, he declines making another. While thus engaged, a midshipman, Mr. J. B. Montgomery, entered and handed him a letter. It was from Lieutenant Elliott, on his way to join him with several officers and eighty-nine seamen. He was electrified by this news, and, as soon as we were alone, declared he had not been so happy since his arrival."

The commodore immediately repaired on board the Lawrence, and despatched the Ariel to run the coast down towards Cattaraugus, and bring up Lieutenant Elliott and his party. They arrived on the tenth of August, and the men proved to be of a very superior character to those which had been hitherto sent; their arrival and their superior character being both in no small degree attributable to the more urgent request of Captain Perry, and his complaints as to the character of those that were sent, which, though producing irritation in the mind of Commodore Chauncey, had also been attended with this salutary effect.

The men brought up by Lieutenant Elliott are represented, indeed, as having been "prime men," the first draught of that character which had yet been received on Lake Erie. This officer, who, soon after, received his commission as a master-commandant, derived the chief benefit from this valuable accession of seamen. The crew of the Lawrence being more nearly complete in numbers, though she had a large number of sick, than that of the Niagara, the greater part of the new draught was taken on board of the Niagara. Sailing-master Taylor, of the Lawrence, happened to be on board of that vessel when Lieutenant Elliott took command of her, and remarked that, as the men arrived alongside of her, Lieutenant Elliott called from the boats the men previously designated for the different stations of importance on board of his vessel. He thus assumed to himself a right of selection among the men, whose relative merits were well known to him, and the residue, after being thus gleaned by him, was distributed among the other vessels. This induced Mr. Taylor, who, being a thorough seaman himself, was well calculated to appreciate the value of seamanship in others, and who was personally interested in seeing a fair share of good men on board the vessel to which he belonged, to remark to his commander, that the different vessels of the squadron were very unequally manned, in consequence of so great a proportion of the effective men being engrossed by the Niagara. With the same magnanimity which he had used on a former occasion towards Captain Morris—a magnanimity most unusual in the service, and which strongly contrasted with the course which Commodore Chauncey had pursued towards him—Captain Perry took no notice of the discourtesy shown to him, as the commanding officer in this unauthorized selection, and no steps to equalize the effective force of the vessel under his command, which was to bear the brunt and burden of the day in his country's battle, with that of his junior officer.

This acceptable re-enforcement of effective men, due, in no inconsiderable degree, to the urgent remonstrances of Captain Perry, was accompanied by a letter, which betrayed great irritation on the part of the commodore, and was well suited to irritate and wound the person to whom it was addressed. It was dated on board the Pike, off Burlington Bay, on the thirteenth of July; and, instead of being directed, as was the custom of the commodore, "to Captain

"Sir,

"I have been duly honoured with your letters of the twenty-third and twenty-sixth ultimo, and notice your anxiety for men and officers. I am equally anxious to furnish you, and no time shall be lost in sending officers and men to you, as soon as the public service will allow me to send them from this lake. I regret that you are not pleased with the men sent you by Messrs. Champlin and Forrest; for, to my knowledge, a part of them are not surpassed by any seamen we have in the fleet; and I have yet to learn that the colour of the skin, or the cut and trimmings of the coat, can affect a man's qualifications or usefulness. I have nearly fifty blacks on board of this ship, and many of them are among my best men; and those people you call soldiers have been to sea from two to seventeen years, and I presume that you will find them as good and useful as any men on board of your vessel, at least if I can judge by comparison, for those which we have on board of this ship are attentive and obedient, and, as far as I can judge, many of them excellent seamen; at any rate, the men sent to Lake Erie have been selected with a view of sending a fair proportion of petty officers and seamen, and I presume, upon examination, it will be found that they are equal to those upon this lake.

"I have received several letters from the secretary of the navy, urging the necessity of the naval force upon Lake Erie acting immediately. You will therefore, as soon as you receive a sufficient number of men, commence your operations against the enemy, and, as soon as possible, co-operate with the army under General Harrison. As you have assured the secretary that you should conceive yourself equal or superior to the enemy with a force in men so much less than I had deemed necessary, there will be a great deal expected from you by your country, and I trust they will not be disappointed in the high expectations formed of your gallantry and judgment. I will barely make an observation, which was impressed upon my mind by an old soldier, that is, 'Never despise your enemy.' I was mortified to see, by your letters to the secretary, extracts and copies of which have been forwarded to me, that you complain that the distance was so great between Sackett's Harbour and Erie that you could not get instructions from me in time to execute with any advantage to the service, thereby intimating the necessity of a separate command. Would it not have been as well to have made the complaint to me instead of the secretary?

"My confidence in your zeal and abilities is undiminished, and I sincerely hope that your success may equal your utmost wishes. I shall despatch to you some officers and seamen and farther instructions on my return to Niagara, where I hope to be the day after to-morrow."

It will be seen that the commodore does not distinctly assert that the men sent to Lake Erie were equal to those whom he had retained. He only presumes that, upon examination, they will be found to be equal. A part of them, he says, to his knowledge, were not surpassed by any seamen in his fleet. The commodore could not have hazarded an unqualified assertion. All the officers on Lake Erie unite in pronouncing the men sent to that lake by Commodore Chauncey as having been the most wretched selection that could have been made; while it is equally notorious in the service, notwithstanding what Mr. Cooper says in exculpation of Commodore Chauncey, as to the generally inferior character of the seamen on all the lakes, that there were on Lake Ontario a large proportion of as good seamen as ever trod a ship's deck; the genuine long queues abounded there. Commodore Chauncey, a thorough seaman himself, had a passion for the collection about him of all the most finished specimens of the true man-of-war's men that could be found; and, unfortunately, the gratification of this taste was brought into collision with the obligations of duty, as well as the sense of magnanimity which rendered it incumbent upon him to send to a junior officer a full and fair share of seamen for the execution of an important trust, and to send them in season. The consciousness that he had not done this, led him to receive with greater irritation Captain Perry's letter of complaint, and prompted the irony and sarcasm of his reply.

The following extract from Mr. Hambleton's journal is amply confirmatory of what we have said with regard to the detention on Lake Ontario. Several officers who served on Lake Ontario confirm the account of the extraordinary number of men, exactly double what were necessary, whom the commodore had continued to crowd together on board the Pike. "Several weeks ago, the secretary of the navy informed Captain Perry that a sufficient number for both lakes had been forwarded. This is true; but, unfortunately, they were all sent to Lake Ontario, where our portion was detained without necessity. For instance, the Pike, with a single deck and twenty-six guns, had four hundred men, most of them prime seamen, mustering in all four hundred and seventy; and even now he has not sent a single officer of rank or experience except Captain Elliott."<sup>6</sup>

With the feeling of an old officer addressing his inferior in rank and age, the commodore may have thought that the commendatory phrase which closed his letter would have qualified the bitterness of his rebuke; but the patience and amiability of Perry was coupled with extreme sensitiveness to whatever affected his honour. On the very day that he received the commodore's letter, he enclosed a copy of it to the secretary of the navy, earnestly requesting that he might be removed from his present station. Mr. Cooper has incorrectly placed Captain Perry's application for removal from his command on the ground of his "complaining of the quality of the crews of the vessels which he commanded." If this statement were to remain uncorrected, it would leave an impression upon the public mind suited to diminish the well-earned fame of Perry; an impression, indeed, which it is the general tendency of all that Mr. Cooper has written with regard to him to produce. But for this circumstance, the difficulty which took place between Commodore Chauncey and Captain Perry would not have been here adverted to, as it did not prevent them from subsequently resuming their friendship. Captain Perry's letter will show the real grounds of his request to be removed from under Commodore Chauncey's command, and the unfounded character of Mr. Cooper's allegation. It is dated on board the Lawrence, at Erie, on the tenth of August.

"Sir,

"I am under the disagreeable necessity of requesting a removal from this station. The enclosed copy of a letter from Commodore Chauncey will, I am satisfied, convince you that I cannot serve longer under an officer who has been so totally regardless of my feelings. The men spoken of by Commodore Chauncey are those mentioned in the roll I did myself the honour to send you. They may, sir, be as good as are on the other lake; but, if so, that squadron must be poorly manned indeed. In the requisition for men sent by your order, I made a note, saying I should consider myself equal or superior to the enemy with a smaller number of men. What then might have been considered certain, may, from lapse of time, be deemed problematical.<sup>7</sup>

"The commodore insinuates that I have taken measures to obtain a separate command. I beg leave to ask you, sir, if anything in any of my letters to you could be construed into such a meaning. On my return to this place in June last, I wrote you that the Queen Charlotte and Lady Prevost were off this harbour, and if they remained a few days I might possibly be able to intercept their return to Malden. I had no orders to act; and the only way of obtaining them in time was to write to you, sir, as the communication between Commodore Chauncey and myself occupied considerably upward of a month. In my request, I meant this as a reason for applying to you on the emergency instead of to the commodore.

"I have been on this station upward of five months, and during that time have submitted cheerfully and with pleasure to fatigue and anxiety hitherto unknown to me in the service. I have had a very responsible situation, without an officer, except one sailing-master, of the least experience. However seriously I have felt my situation, not a murmur has escaped me. The critical state of General Harrison was such that I took upon myself the very great responsibility of going out with the few young officers you had been pleased to send me, with the few seamen I had, and as many volunteers as I could muster from the militia. I did not shrink from this responsibility; but, sir, at that very moment I surely did not anticipate the receipt of a letter in every line of which is insult. Under all these circumstances, I beg most respectfully and most earnestly that I may be immediately removed from this station. I am willing to forego that reward which I have considered for two months past almost within my grasp. If, sir, I have rendered my country any service in the equipment of this squadron, I beg it may be considered an inducement to grant my request. I shall proceed with the squadron and whatever is in my power shall be done to promote the interest and honor of the service."

The reader may thus see for himself that Captain Perry's application for removal from his command was made upon the specific ground that he was unwilling to serve under an officer who had been totally regardless of his feelings, by addressing to him a letter which he conceived to be insulting in every line, and not in any measure or degree on account of "the quality of the crews of the vessels he commanded," as is incorrectly alleged by Mr. Cooper. In going out with only three hundred officers and men, and a few militia volunteers hastily collected, on his own responsibility and without orders to act, he manifested his willingness to meet the enemy, whatever might be "the quality of the crews of the vessels he commanded," as he subsequently did his ability to triumph signally with the same materials.

Lieutenant Elliott was at the same time the bearer of a second letter from Commodore Chauncey, dated off Niagara on the third of August, in which he expressed the hope that the one hundred officers and men accompanying Lieutenant Elliott, together with such assistance as Captain Perry might be able to get from the army, would place him so nearly upon a footing with the enemy as to enable him to go out and offer battle, and open, if possible, an immediate intercourse with General Harrison. Commodore Chauncey also expressed his disappointment at not being able to send Captain Perry any marines, as he had expected to have done. He stated that, as Captain Wainwright, who had been announced as about to arrive with a detachment, had not reached Sackett's Harbour before the commodore sailed, he was unable to send them at that time without distressing his own ship; but, as soon as he should return to Sackett's Harbour, he promised to send fifty marines to Captain Perry. Ten days after making this promise, the commodore, while on his way to Sackett's Harbour, met with the schooner Lady of the Lake, which, by his order, was transporting the promised detachment of marines to Niagara, to be thence forwarded to Lake Erie. Commodore Chauncey now took these marines, which he had promised to Captain Perry, and which would have been so valuable to him, on board of his own vessels. The reason assigned by Mr. Cooper for this unjust appropriation was, that Commodore Chauncey had recently lost one hundred and fifty men by the foundering of two of his vessels, and the capture of two others by the enemy in action, on the night of the tenth of August. Yet, three or four days after Commodore Chauncey deemed it necessary to strengthen himself with this feeble re-enforcement to his large force, but which would have been of so much importance to the smaller force of Captain Perry, we find the commodore, in the absence of two of his cruisers, the Fair American and Asp, offering battle to the whole British squadron off the False Ducks. If the commodore considered himself a match for the British squadron without two of his cruisers, with still more confidence might he have gone into action with those two vessels, and without the fifty marines withheld from Lake Erie, where their presence was so essential. As for the substitution of either militiamen or newly-levied regular troops for marines, it is needless to say how ill the former could supply the place of the latter. Marines, from the long-continued habit of serving on shipboard, are as much at home there as seamen, and are of essential use in the discharge of every ordinary duty. In battle, whether stationed at the great guns, to the exercise of which they are trained in all well-disciplined ships, as, indeed, they should be while in barracks, or using their own appropriate arms, they have ever shown the most devoted courage. These circumstances add to the injustice which Commodore Chauncey did to Captain Perry in withholding from him his due quota of marines, under a pretext which is wholly insufficient. It would be unfair to Commodore Chauncey not to state that the injustice done by him to Captain Perry, in withholding a sufficient number of good men, has been practised not unfrequently by our old commanders, though, perhaps, in less critical circumstances. Deprived of the distinction of higher grades as a just reward of faithful services, and accustomed yearly to see their juniors take rank beside them, they cling with pertinacity to every admitted attribute of their superior station, and use their authority in a narrow spirit, and with reference chiefly to themselves. The subjects of injustice themselves, they are not a little prone to exercise injustice towards others. The creation of a higher grade, while it would incalculably promote the discipline and best interests of the service, would impart a magnanimity to our old commanders in their relations with their inferiors, which they are at present but little in the habit of practising.

It may be as well here to state, that the difficulty growing out of Commodore Chauncey's harsh letter of the thirtieth of July was closed, so far as these two officers were concerned, by the following reply of Commodore Chauncey to Captain Perry's letter, announcing his having requested to be withdrawn from Lake Erie. It is inserted in justice to Commodore Chauncey, as being alike creditable to his good sense and good feeling. The letter is dated at Sackett's Harbour on the twenty-seventh of August.

"Sir,

"I have received your letter of the eleventh instant, wherein you inform me that you had enclosed a copy of my letter of the thirtieth of July to the honourable the secretary of the navy, with a request that you might be immediately removed from Lake Erie. I regret your determination for various reasons; the first and most important is, that the public service would suffer from a change, and your removal might in some degree defeat the objects of the campaign. Although I conceive that you have treated me with less candour than I was entitled to, considering the warm interest that I have always taken in your behalf, yet my confidence in your zeal and ability has been undiminished, and I should really regret that any circumstance should remove you from your present command before you have accomplished the objects for which you were sent to Erie; and I trust that you will give the subject all the consideration that its importance requires before you make up your mind definitely. You ought also to consider that the first duty of an officer is to sacrifice all personal feelings to his public duties."

The volunteers from the militia which Captain Perry had taken on board to go in pursuit of the enemy had only been for that single cruise. He was unable to procure any permanent volunteers to perform the duty of marines during the cruising season. With his small force, a few short of four hundred officers and men, he sailed on the twelfth of August from Erie, to proceed up the lake and place himself in cooperation with the northwestern army, the headquarters of which were then at Seneca, on the banks of the Sandusky. The order of sailing established by Perry for his squadron was in a double column; the Lawrence, Purcupine, Caledonia, Ohio, and Ariel being on the right, and the Niagara, Trippe, Tigress, Somers, and Scorpion on the left, in the order respectively in which they are named. It will be seen that he had now added the Ohio and Trippe to his squadron, under the command respectively of Sailing-master D. Dobbin and Lieutenant J. E. Smith. There was also an established line of battle in one line, with the Ariel and Scorpion, the two fastest of the small vessels, stationed on the opposite side from the enemy, and near the commodore, in a situation to support any part of the line that might require it. In a subsequent order, the Scorpion was brought into the line, and the distance between the vessels was fixed at a half cable's length. Finally, there was an order of attack, in which a particular antagonist in the British squadron was assigned to each vessel of ours, which was intended, to facilitate the business of remodelling the line of battle, if necessary, according to the arrangement of the enemy's squadron when it should be fallen in with, and to fix in the mind of each commander his special adversary. In this order of attack Perry had reserved to himself the privilege of fighting the largest of the enemy's ships, and had accordingly placed the Lawrence opposite the Detroit in the diagram, and the Niagara, in like manner, opposite the second British ship, the Queen Charlotte. Provision was made, in case of a separation of our vessels and an accidental rencounter in the night, to prevent a collision under the impression of their being enemies, that our vessels should hoist one light and hail, the vessel to windward should answer first "Jones," to which the leewardmost would answer "Madison." The additional order was subsequently issued, that, in the event of the enemy's approaching our squadron to attack it while at anchor, the signal of two consecutive musket-shots from the Lawrence would be a signal for the vessels to cut their cables and make sail, beginning with the leewardmost, and form astern of the Lawrence, which would show a light; three consecutive musket-shots would be the signal to weigh in the same succession. The orders were all well conceived to promote concerted action and prevent surprise, and indicated judgment and forethought.

On the sixteenth the squadron arrived off Cunningham's Island, near the head of the lake, without having seen the enemy. It was blowing fresh at the time, which prevented it from taking a berth close in with Sandusky Bar, as Perry had intended, in order to disembark the military stores for the army, and communicate with General Harrison. On the following day, one of the enemy's small cruisers having hove in sight, probably to reconnoitre, the squadron gave chase and was nearly up with her, when, night coming on, she disappeared among the group of the Sisters.

The squadron now anchored off Sandusky, and General Harrison came on board the Lawrence on the nineteenth of August, in the evening, accompanied by Generals Cass and M'Arthur, Colonel Gaines, Major Croghan, with the whole of his numerous staff, and twenty-six chiefs of the Shawnee, Wyandot, and Delaware Indians; among whom were three highly influential ones, Crane, Black Hoof, and Captain Tommy by name. The object of the general in bringing the Indians was, that they might inform their friends then with the enemy of our force, with the hope of detaching them. They were, of course, filled with wonder at the spectacle of our "big canoes," On the morning of the twentieth, a salute was fired in honor of the general's visit. Perry learned from him that he was not ready to advance, and determined, in the interim, to go in pursuit of the enemy's squadron and offer it battle. The general and commodore spent the day in reconnoitring Put-in Bay, to the advantages of which the general had first called his attention. After concerting their plans for the removal of the army to this point, when it should be all assembled previously to invading Canada, the general returned on the twenty-first to his camp. Perry proceeded on the twenty-third to Put-in Bay, and on the twenty-fifth stood for Malden, and discovered the British squadron at anchor within Bar Point. It had not yet been reenforced by the new ship Detroit, which they could not discern. The wind blew fresh at the time; and, as the Bay of Malden can only be approached and left again with a leading breeze, when the wind is from southwest or northeast, Captain Perry thought it unsafe to run the risk of getting embayed, in which event he would be much exposed to lose some of his dullest sailers. On this account, and in consequence of being attacked with bilious remittent fever, a disease which was very prevalent in the squadron, and which was attended with almost immediate prostration of strength, he took his squadron into Put-in Bay. This is a snug harbour, formed by the group of Bass Islands. It opens towards the Canada shore in the direction of Malden, overlooks the passage into the upper and lower lakes, and offers an admirable point for protecting the adjacent coasts of Ohio, and the outlets of the numberless streams which here disembogue into Lake Erie. Soon after Perry's attack, his disease, owing doubtless to the strength of his constitution, assumed a very malignant character. The surgeon of the Lawrence was seriously ill, as were the chaplain, Mr. T. Breese, and Alexander Perry, the commodore's brother. The assistant surgeon, Dr. U. Parsons, himself out of health, was obliged to prescribe for the commodore, and all the sick of the Lawrence and of the small vessels. He resorted at once, in the commodore's case, to strong remedial measures, and applied a blister to the back of his neck. On the twenty-eighth of August Dr. Parsons himself became affected with the prevailing fever. Though so ill as to be incapable of walking, with a humane self-devotion most honourable to him, he continued to attend at the bedsides of the sick, to which he was carried, and to prescribe for them, not only on board of the Lawrence, but on board the small vessels, being lifted for the purpose on board of them in his cot, and the sick brought on deck for his prescription.

On the thirty-first of August, while lying in Putin Bay, Perry received from General Harrison a reenforcement of near one hundred men, which, after deducting a few deaths, and others left on shore as useless at Erie, carried the total of his muster-roll to four hundred and ninety souls. Some of the men who had been selected from General M'Arthur's brigade were lake or river boatmen, and were received as seamen. The majority, however, were intended to perform duty as marines in the squadron, in consequence of the disappointment in receiving the expected guard from Ontario. The men detailed for this service were chiefly taken from the Kentucky militia and from the twenty-eighth regiment of infantry, which had recently joined the army from Kentucky, where it had been entirely raised. The whole party, officers and men included, were volunteers, led by a spirit of adventure to embark in an enterprise so different from the previous habits of their life. Few of them had ever seen a vessel before they were marched to the mouth of the Sandusky, and their astonishment and curiosity when they got on board were irrepressible. They climbed to the masthead; dove to the bottom of the hold; passed, without stopping or understanding any distinction, from the sick bay to the captain's cabin, expressing their admiration as they went in awkward but rapturous terms. These Kentuckians were dressed in their favourite fringed linsey-woolsey hunting-shirts and drawers, and were themselves equally an object of curiosity to the officers and seamen, few of whom had ever seen any of these hardy borderers. Perry, for a time, was amused with the rest; but began, ere long, to fear that his extraordinary marines would lend but little assistance in their appropriate office of sustaining the discipline and etiquette of the squadron. Soon after their arrival, he briefly stated to the non-commissioned officer in command of that portion of the detachment which had been detailed for his own vessel, the nature of the duties that would be required of them, and the line of conduct they would be required to preserve. The officer then mustered his men on deck, and informed them that they had been kindly indulged by Commodore Perry with an opportunity of gratifying their curiosity by seeing the ship, in doing which they had been permitted to violate the rules and discipline of the sea-service without rebuke. They must now come to order, and submit themselves to the usual discipline of marines, confine themselves to their proper places, and attend to their appropriate duties, which were forthwith explained to them. The stout Kentuckians took the admonition in good part; they carefully conformed to all that was required of them, were of essential use in manning the squadron, and replacing the marines and seamen which Commodore Chauncey had withheld; and their association with Perry was, to such of them as survived to tell the tale of their adventures, a special and enduring source of gratification.

His complement thus completed as to numbers, this valuable interval of repose was profitably employed, by Perry's orders in teaching his ill-assorted crews their duty, and training them in the various evolutions preparatory to battle.

After a week's confinement to his berth, Perry became convalescent, and found himself sufficiently well on the first of September to be upon deck. On that day he got his squadron once more in motion and stood off Malden. As the weather was settled and the wind favourable for standing in and out of the bay, Captain Perry ran very close in, and continued off the harbour the whole day with his colours set. He found their new ship, the Detroit, rigged and anchored with the rest of their squadron at the mouth of the harbour, under cover of a battery on the mainland, flanked by a second on an island opposite. His anticipations of the enemy's obtaining a superior force by the equipment of this ship, which he had studied to prevent by appearing on the lake and striking a blow while his force was yet superior to that of the enemy, being thus defeated by the delay of Commodore Chauncey in sending the crews for his vessels, it only remained for him to try the issue of a battle, of which the chances were now rendered so much against him. This purpose he was still no less firmly bent on effecting. It appears, moreover, that he already meditated an attack on the enemy under the guns of his batteries, should he be unsuccessful in drawing him out, in concert with an attack from General Harrison by land.

As the enemy showed no disposition at this time to accept the offer of battle thus made to him, on equal terms, in the open lake, Perry, after carefully reconnoitring his position, bore up for Sandusky on the second of September, in order to communicate with General Harrison with regard to embarking his army for an attack on Malden. Captain Perry was of opinion that he could embark twenty-five hundred or three thousand men; but they would so encumber his decks as to destroy the use of the great guns. He called the general's attention to a small island, known as the Middle Sister, distant about fifteen miles from Malden, which he thought would offer an excellent rendezvous the day previous to an attack. This suggestion was subsequently adopted.

A most deeply mortifying circumstance attended Captain Perry's return to Sandusky. He found there two separate letters from the secretary of the navy, dated on the eighteenth of August. One of them was in reply to his application for removal from the command of Lake Erie. It was an exceedingly temperate and judicious letter, in which, while he was informed that the interests of the public service did not admit of a change of commanders under existing circumstances, his patriotism and sense of duty were powerfully appealed to as motives for inducing him to allay his feelings of discontent, to avoid recrimination, and persevere in the zealous and honourable path of duty which he had hitherto pursued with so much credit to himself and advantage to his country. The secretary concluded his letter with the following admirable sentiment, so well suited to influence a generous temper:

"It is the duty of an officer, and in none does his character shine more conspicuous, to sacrifice all personal motives and feelings when in collision with the public good. This sacrifice you are called upon to make; and I calculate with confidence upon your efforts to restore and preserve harmony, and to concentrate the vigorous exertions of all in carrying into effect the great objects of your enterprise."

The soothing and complimentary effects of this letter were, however, accompanied by a very bitter antidote in another letter from the same functionary of the same date, which, without once adverting to the subject of the difficulty with Commodore Chauncey, or the tendered resignation of the Lake Erie command, was filled throughout with reproof and animadversion, expressed occasionally in a tone sufficiently bitter and taunting. It commenced thus abruptly:

"A draught has been drawn upon me for four thousand two hundred and seventy-eight dollars for lead ballast. This appears to me extraordinary; for, admitting there was no pig-iron, yet as you are on a fresh-water lake, and require no room for water, and but little for provisions and stores for a short cruise, stone, properly stowed and leveled, would have answered every purpose. I presume, if neither pig-iron nor lead could have been procured, that the object would not have been frustrated on that account. I make great allowances for the remote situation and want of local resources, but the expenditures have been great indeed.

"I observe Mr. Magrath, a purser, in command of one of the vessels. You have several officers, highly spoken of by their late commanders, who are now commissioned lieutenants. Two of them, Messrs. Yarnall and Packett, have brought valuable prizes across the Atlantic. You have complained very much, and it appears to me rather unreasonably, of the want of officers. Those you have have seen considerable service, from which they are regularly entitled to the situations they now hold, and Mr. Magrath cannot command to the prejudice of the lieutenants. You surely do not expect the frigates to be stripped of the senior lieutenants in order to furnish you with what you are pleased to consider experienced officers.

"I regret to observe, by a letter from General Harrison, received yesterday at the department of war, that he appears to be under the impression that you are destitute of qualified officers, and that your crews are composed of anything but seamen. If he has received the impression from you, I deem it extremely improper; and I am mortified that the idea has considerable currency. If the fact was really so, its existence was not to be made a matter of public notoriety, to embolden the enemy and depress the confidence of the officers and men in their own powers. If you were yourself convinced of the fact, it was a proper ground of remonstrance to this department, and would ever have been a justification on your part in declining to meet the enemy until a remedy should have been applied."

There seems to be something disingenuous in the mode adopted by the secretary to get rid of the main difficulty with regard to Captain Perry's objections to Commodore Chauncey's letter, by counselling conciliation and appealing to his patriotism, and yet, on the same day, returning upon him with sevenfold acrimony in connexion with the same difficulties; holding him, moreover, responsible for the very deficiency of officers and men of which he had such just reason to complain, and for the tendency of this notorious deficiency to depress his own men and embolden the enemy. Instructed to co-operate with General Harrison, and constantly urged by him to join company, how could he avoid stating to him the causes of his inability to comply? His sneer at the extravagance of Captain Perry's pretensions, and at the absurdity of stripping the frigates of their senior lieutenants in order to furnish him with what he was pleased to consider experienced officers, was no less futile and ridiculous than it was insulting. On the day that Captain Perry received this harsh rebuke, he wrote a temperate and respectful reply, amply vindicating himself from the charges thus brought against him. It was in the following words:

"I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the eighteenth ultimo, and am sorry to observe that my conduct in several particulars is disapproved by the department. No doubt I have fallen into many errors, but I beg leave to assure you that I have used my best exertions to forward the views of the department in the equipment of the vessels on this lake with the least possible expense and delay. If I have failed, I hope the failure will be attributed to anything but want of zeal for the service and a proper attention to the important interests committed to my care. On ascertaining that pig-iron could not be had, and being informed that lead would at any time command cost at Erie, I did not hesitate to order it, the runs in the vessels being so low as not to admit a sufficient quantity of stone ballast. The expenditures on this station have no doubt amounted to a large sum; but I am well convinced, when critically examined, it will be found to have been necessary. I have not authorized the purchase of a single article but what I deemed absolutely necessary, and I have paid the strictest attention to economy in every particular.

"I was aware, at the time I appointed Mr. Magrath, that it was irregular, but I was fully convinced that it was the best arrangement that I could make. I knew him to be an experienced sea-officer, and that his appointment did not interfere with the wishes of the other officers.<sup>9</sup> Mr. Packett, then acting lieutenant, by his own application had command of the Ariel, and Mr. Yarnall, made acting lieutenant by myself, was the second officer of this vessel. Neither of them would have preferred the command of the Caledonia to the situation he held.

"I am sorry that my application for experienced officers should have been considered unreasonable. Mr. Yarnall and Mr. Packett are certainly fine young men, and will make valuable officers. But two sloops of war and nine other vessels required a much greater number of officers than I had, and, as I conceived, of more experience. If I have been too urgent in this particular, I hope the ardent desire I had to have under my command a force adequate to the object in view, will serve as my apology.

"Heretofore I have considered myself fortunate in having but little said in the public prints respecting my force. So far from giving currency to the opinion that is said to prevail, I have endeavoured, as much as possible, to conceal my weakness. But in a village like Erie it must at all times be impossible to conceal the numbers or nature of such a force, but particularly when there were several thousand militia in the place, all eager to know the exact state of affairs, and as eager to communicate to their correspondents the result of their inquiries. The commanders of the vessels were personally known to the inhabitants; and it was easy for any printer to procure a list for publication, without applying to me or any officer under my command. The list published was without my knowledge. Nor will it be thought strange that General Harrison should have had a tolerably correct idea of the nature of the force at Erie, when it is known that one of his officers was stationed there for several weeks before the squadron sailed. I have the honour to enclose you extracts of my letters to him on the subject, which I hope will not be thought improper when our relative situation is considered. I have this day placed Lieutenant Turner in command of the Caledonia."

With regard to the imputed extravagance of the expenditures, it may be farther remarked, that the expenses of the construction of the Erie squadron fell far below those of vessels of equal size on Lake Ontario; and, farthermore, that Perry had, of his own free-will, relinquished the financial agency for the lake,<sup>8</sup> which would have proved a source of considerable profit to him, from the belief that it would interfere with his more important obligations. It is truly painful thus to see Perry reduced to the necessity of defending himself. The fulness of the defence shows, however, the absurd and simulated character of the charges. Henceforth other cares than those of selfvindication remain for him, and the ingenuity of the censorious secretary is tasked to devise commendatory phrases instead of detecting imaginary faults.

ON the fourth of September Captain Perry despatched the Ohio to Erie for provisions and stores, with directions to hasten back, as her services would probably be required in a week. On the fifth, our squadron still continuing in Sandusky Bay, three citizens arrived from Malden, who communicated to Captain Perry that the British army under General Proctor being short of provisions, it had been determined that the squadron should sail to engage ours, and endeavour to open a communication with Long Point, so as to draw the necessary supplies from the depot at that place. Captain Perry now also received more accurate information than he had yet obtained as to the force of the enemy's squadron. From the information he then obtained, with what was afterward learned of the squadron, we will now state that it consisted of the new and very strongly-built ship Detroit, of five hundred tons and nineteen guns, all long except two twenty-four pound carronades; of the ship Queen Charlotte, of four hundred tons and seventeen guns, three of them being long guns, the Detroit and Queen Charlotte having each one of the long guns on a pivot; of the schooner Lady Prevost, of two hundred and thirty tons and thirteen guns, three being long guns; of the brig Hunter, of one hundred and eighty tons and ten guns; of the sloop Little Belt, of one hundred tons and three guns, two long twelves and one long eighteen; and of the schooner Chippeway, of one hundred tons, mounting one long eighteen; making in all sixty-three guns, thirty-five of which were long. The squadron was commanded by Captain Robert Heriot Barclay, a veteran officer, who had served with distinction in many of those naval engagements which had rendered the name and flag of England so terrible on the ocean, and who had been with Nelson at Trafalgar, and been desperately wounded in that ever-memorable seafight; more recently, as first lieutenant of a frigate, he had lost an arm in action with the French. He was a skilful seaman, and an officer of approved courage. He was seconded by a brave and experienced officer in Captain Finnis, with others of honourable standing in their profession. He had, within a day or two, received a draught of fifty men from the Dover troop-ship, then lying at Quebec, and his crews now consisted of one hundred and fifty men from the royal navy, as admitted in the finding of the court-martial on Commodore Barclay, with, according to James's statement, eighty Canadian sailors, and two hundred and forty soldiers from the forty-first regiment of the line and the regiment of Newfoundland Rangers, chiefly from the former; making together, by their own account, an aggregate of four hundred and seventy seamen and soldiers, to whom are to be added thirty-two officers known to have been in the squadron, making in all five hundred and two souls.<sup>1</sup>

Of our vessels, mounting in all fifty-four guns, only the Lawrence and Niagara, each of five hundred tons, could be considered men-of-war. The others were exceedingly frail, and without bulwarks. They were chiefly armed with long guns. The brigs mounted each twenty guns, eighteen thirty-two pound carronades and two long twelves. They constituted the main dependence of the squadron, and could only be effective against an enemy chiefly armed with long guns by coming at once to close action. The second in command of the American squadron was Captain J. D. Elliott, who had recently superseded Lieutenant D. Turner in the command of the Niagara, on the eve of sailing from Erie. The other officers were very young men, of little experience though of great promise, and sailing-masters taken from the merchant service, chiefly selected by Captain Perry from among his fellow-townsmen, and all of whom did great credit to his selection, and proved most worthy of his confidence. The whole force in officers and men of our squadron amounted to four hundred and ninety; of these, one hundred and sixteen were on the sick-lists of the different vessels on the morning of the action, seventy-eight cases being of bilious fever. There were a greater number of so-called seamen among them than in the British squadron, but they were such as remained from the draughts sent to Lake Ontario after the best materials had been selected. They were of all colours and climes, reduced in numbers and emaciated by disease. The Kentucky volunteers were stout fellows, it is true, with gallant spirits, but utter strangers to ships, and unaccustomed to discipline. Those who have been accustomed to look upon the picked soldiers of a British regiment will readily believe that the soldiers embarked in the British squadron were not less stout than the Kentuckians. They had been trained to subordination by years of service, while their voyages to every clime whither the ambition of England carries her triumphant arms had made them familiar with the ocean, and at home on shipboard. The physical force, like the force in ships and number of guns was greatly in favour of the English. A consideration of the intelligence thus obtained as to the enemy's superiority did not check Captain Perry's oft-repeated desire to meet him. It was not in his nature to neglect the advice of Commodore Chauncey, however tauntingly given, however well suited to increase his responsibility in the event of failure, "Never despise your enemy!" But if he did not despise his enemy, he had yet a just sense of his own resources, a proper confidence in himself. He shared, in a degree in no respect inferior, the feeling which made all things possible to Nelson, which impelled Paul Jones to enterprises of such seeming hardihood.

On the receipt of this intelligence of Barclay's preparations to encounter him, Perry set sail from Sandusky on the sixth of September, and, after reconnoitring the enemy off Malden, and observing that he was still at his moorings, returned to Put-in Bay, which offered so many facilities for watching his movements. Here the last preparations were made for battle, the last instructions given to regulate the conduct of the subordinate commanders. The commanders of the various vessels, being summoned by signal on board the Lawrence, were each furnished with Perry's corrected instructions for their government; and he farther explained to them verbally his views with regard to whatever contingency might occur. He now produced a battle-flag, which he had caused to be privately prepared by Mr. Hambleton before leaving Erie, and the hoisting of which to the main royal mast of the Lawrence was to be his signal for action: a blue flag, bearing, in large white letters, "Don't give up the ship!" the dying words of the hero whose name she bore. When about to withdraw, he stated to them his intention to bring the enemy from the first to close quarters, in order not to lose by the short range of his carronades; and the last emphatic injunction with which he dismissed them was, that he could not, in case of difficulty, advise them better than in the words of Lord Nelson, "If you lay your enemy close alongside, you cannot be out of your place!"

Every preparation had thus been made to meet the enemy, and the young commander had done all that depended upon him to secure a triumph for his country. The crew were all well stationed, had become thoroughly practised at the guns, and felt something of the confidence which familiarity with the weapons they were to use inspires. The sickness, however, had extended itself throughout the fleet, and operated as a great discouragement. On the eighth, all the medical officers were ill but Dr. Parsons, who, though but half recovered, had returned to duty. He was obliged to be carried twice through the rain, which continued the whole day, to see the surgeon and the other sick of the Niagara. By Dr. Parsons' advice, the water used by the crews was boiled; it being thought that the prevailing dysentery, and perhaps the fever, were caused by the use of the lake water.

The British commander, who had shown a chivalrous spirit throughout, did not long keep his antagonist in suspense. At sunrise on the morning of the tenth of September, the British squadron was discovered from the masthead of the Lawrence, on the northwestern board, standing towards Put-in Bay, in which our squadron was lying. Barclay's object was evidently attack, not an uninterrupted passage to Long Point, which he could certainly have had; and if battle was only an alternative with him, to be risked in extremity when it could no longer be avoided, he could have risked it on his return with supplies for the army, if it could no longer be avoided.

Barclay, choosing his time, might have sailed out along the Canada shore to the northward of all the islands in the night, and got well to the eastward down the lake before Perry's look-out vessels which he kept off the Sister Islands, could have advised him of the enemy being out. But he bore gallantly down to engage, choosing his time so as to have a long day before him, coming more than half way towards his enemy, and offering him battle on his own coast. This fact is interesting, setting completely at rest the pretension to any inferiority of force on the part of the British, never set up by Barclay or his officers at the time, and only since produced by disingenuous and unfaithful historians, endeavouring systematically to account, by an alleged superiority of force, for a victory that, at any rate in this instance, was effected by superior gunnery, and the extraordinary mental resources of the victorious commander.<sup>2</sup>

The fact of the British squadron being in sight of the masthead was at once reported to Perry by Lieutenant Dulany Forrest, the officer of the deck on board the Lawrence. He ordered the signal made "under way to get!" In a few minutes the whole squadron was under sail, beating out of the harbour against a light breeze from southwest, and with the boats ahead to tow.

Snake Island and some other islands of the Bass group interposed between our squadron and the enemy. By beating round to windward of these islands, our squadron would have had a leading breeze to run down upon the enemy, and, consequently, the weather-gauge in the approaching battle. With this view the squadron had commenced beating out. The wind, however, was very unsteady, and, as not unfrequently happens on such occasions, it headed the squadron off almost every time it crossed the channel and was obliged to tack. Several hours had passed in this way. It was near ten o'clock, when Captain Perry, now become impatient, addressed his sailing-master, Mr. Taylor, who was working the Lawrence, and asked his opinion as to the probable time that would still be required to weather the islands. When Mr. Taylor's reply confirmed the opinion he had himself formed of the probable delay that this evolution would occasion, Perry told the master he would wear ship, and run to leeward of the islands. Mr. Taylor remarked that they would then have to engage the enemy from to leeward. Captain Perry replied, "I don't care, to windward or to leeward, they shall fight to-day!" The signal was accordingly made to wear ship; but, before the evolution was performed, the wind shifted suddenly to southeast, and enabled the squadron to clear the island and keep the weather-gauge. The anecdote is illustrative of Perry's fixed determination to fight. With an armament composed chiefly of carronades, in surrendering the weather-gauge to a squadron having a preponderance of long guns, he gave up the ability, in a great measure, to choose the distance at which he would fight the enemy, which, with such relative armaments, was an advantage of no slight importance. Still he was aware that, with an enemy so gallantly seeking an encounter, the lee-gauge had also its advantages. It would have enabled him, while the enemy was bearing down, to rake him for a period more or less long, according to the strength of the breeze, with his whole broadsides, while the enemy would only be able to assail him from his bow-chasers; it would have enabled him, moreover, to form his squadron in a compact line, so essential to such a mixed force, and await the necessarily more disordered attack of the enemy. The lee-gauge, too, would have afforded great facility for relieving disabled vessels, by permitting them to drop under cover of the line, or might have enabled the whole squadron, if worsted in a first encounter, to run to leeward, form a fresh line of battle, and engage a second time with increased chances of success.

At ten o'clock the Lawrence was cleared for action, shot collected in the racks and in circular grummets of rope, pistols and cutlasses brought by the boarders to quarters, preventer braces rove, matches lit, and the decks wet and sanded, to prevent the explosion of scattering powder, and create a secure foothold amid the approaching carnage. At this hour the enemy, having lost all hope of obtaining the weather-gauge by manoeuvring, and observing our squadron coming out, hove to in line of battle on the larboard tack, with the heads of his vessels to the southward and westward. The wind continued light from southeast, enabling the vessels to advance at the rate of near three knots an hour; the weather was serene, and the lake perfectly still. There had been a slight rain in the morning; but, with the shift of wind, the clouds had blown away, and the day assumed all the splendour of our early autumn. The British vessels were freshly painted and in high condition; being hove to in close order, with the morning sun shining upon their broadsides, and their red ensigns gently unfolding to the breeze, they made a very gallant appearance as our squadron bore down to engage them, with the wind on the larboard quarter. It was now discovered that Barclay had formed his line with the Chippeway, of one long eighteen on a pivot, in the van; the Detroit, of nineteen guns, second in the line; the Hunter, of ten guns, third; the Queen Charlotte, of seventeen guns, fourth; the Lady Prevost, of thirteen guns, fifth; and the Little Belt, of three guns, sixth. Captain Perry now remodeled his line of battle, so as to bring his heaviest vessels opposite to their designated antagonists. Claiming for himself the most formidable antagonist, he passed ahead of the Niagara so as to encounter the Detroit, and stationed the Scorpion, of two long guns, ahead, and the Ariel, of four short twelves, on his weather bow, where, with her light battery, and having, like the other small vessels, no bulwarks, she might be partially under cover. The Caledonia, of three long twenty-fours, came next, to encounter the Hunter; the Niagara next, so as to be opposite her designated antagonist, the Queen Charlotte; and the Somers, of two long thirty-twos, the Porcupine, of one long thirty-two, Tigress, of one long twenty-four, and Trippe, of one long thirty-two, in succession towards the rear, to encounter the Lady Prevost and Little Belt. The line being formed, Perry now bore up for the enemy, distant at ten o'clock about six miles.<sup>3</sup> He now produced the lettered burgee which, at the last assembly of his commanders to receive their instructions, he had exhibited as the concerted signal for battle. Having unfurled it, he mounted on a gun-slide, and, calling his crew about him, thus briefly addressed them: "My brave lads! this flag contains the last words of Captain Lawrence! Shall I hoist it?" "Ay! ay! sir!" resounded from every voice in the ship, and the flag was briskly swayed to the main royal masthead of the Lawrence. The encouragement of these few brief words, and, still more, the mild and cheerful smile with which they were uttered; the habitual expression of his countenance, which gave such a winning fascination to his manners, imparted a rare spirit and alacrity to the crew; they responded to their young and beloved commander's appeal with three hearty and enthusiastic cheers, which, as the battle-flag unfolded and became visible to the crews of the other vessels, were responded to enthusiastically throughout the line. In this moment of heroic excitement, all the sick that were capable of motion came on deck to offer their feeble services in defence of their country; not a little excited thereto by the reflection that their young commander, reduced, like themselves, by a wasting disease, and hardly recovered, was standing bravely at his post.

As the ordinary mealtime was certain to find them engaged, the noonday grog was now served, and the bread-bags freely resorted to; after which all repaired once more to their quarters. Perry now went round the deck carefully examining his battery gun by gun, to see that everything was in ample order, stopping at each and exchanging words with the captain. For all he had some pleasant joke, some expression of encouragement. Seeing some of the Constitution's, he said to them, "Well, boys! are you ready?" "All ready, your honour!" was the brief reply, with a general touch of the hat or the handkerchief which some of the old salts had substituted for their more cumbrous trucks. "But I need not say anything to you," he added; "you know how to beat those fellows." Passing on, he exclaimed, with a smile of recognition, "Ah! here are the Newport boys! they will do their duty, I warrant!"<sup>4</sup>

A dead silence of an hour and a half succeeded, during which our squadron continued slowly to approach the enemy, steering for the head of his line on a course forming about half a right angle with it, the headmost vessels under easy sail, the others with everything set. Every preparation for battle had been long since made. The interval of inactivity, so trying to the warrior, was passed in silence, or in low and brief requests, among officers and men, to render to each other, in case of death, some office of friendship, the survivor to take charge of the effects of the deceased, or to break to his relations the news of their bereavement. Perry gave Mr. Hambleton, who stood near him in charge of the after guns, directions how to act with regard to his private affairs in the event of his death. He leaded his public papers in readiness to be thrown overboard, and destroyed his private ones. "It appeared," says Mr. Hambleton, "to go hard with him to part with his wife's letters. After giving them a hasty reading, he tore them to ribands, observing that, let what would happen, the enemy should not read them, and closed by remarking, ' this is the most important day of my life.'"

The suspense, though long, had its end. Suddenly a bugle was heard to sound on board the Detroit, the signal for loud and concerted cheers throughout the British squadron. Soon after, being a quarter before meridian, the enemy's flag ship Detroit, then distant about a mile and a half, commenced the action by firing a single shot at the Lawrence, which did not take effect. Signal was now made for each vessel to engage her opponent, as designated in previous orders. At this time the Ariel, Scorpion, Lawrence, Caledonia, and Niagara were all in their respective stations, in the order they are named, distant from each other about half a cable's length. The other vessels, not sailing quite so well, were a little out of their stations astern. In addition to the inferiority of our force, we had a serious disadvantage from its being broken up into greater numbers. The line of battle prescribed half a cable's length for the distance of the vessels from each other, the least, probably, that could have been adopted. Hence, having three more vessels than the enemy, our line necessarily overspread his not less than one thousand feet. Thus, besides all the other disadvantages of the inferior size of our vessels, the enemy could bring to bear upon them a heavier battery in a smaller space, and thus, being stronger at any given point, had a greater superiority even than his nominal one.

The second shot from a long gun of the Detroit, five minutes later than the first, took effect on the Lawrence as she fanned down towards the enemy, passing through both bulwarks, when fire was also opened from the long guns of all the British squadron, which, as they lay drawn up in line of battle, did not materially differ in distance from the Lawrence and the two schooners on her weather bow. At five minutes before meridian, the Lawrence, beginning to suffer considerably from the enemy's fire, returned it from her long twelve pounder, when the schooners on the weather bow, being ordered by trumpet to commence the action, and the Caledonia and Niagara astern, likewise opened their fire with their long guns. The sternmost vessels soon after opened also, but at too great a distance to do much injury.

Owing to the superiority of the enemy in long guns—the entire armament of the Detroit, with the exception of two carronades, being of this description —this cannonade was greatly to the disadvantage of the Lawrence, against which the British fire was chiefly directed. In order to hasten the moment when his carronades would take effect, and enable him to return more fully the fire of the enemy, Perry now made all sail again, and ordered the word to be passed by trumpet for the vessels astern to close up and take their stations. The order was responded to and transmitted along the line by Captain Elliott, of the Niagara, whose vessel was stationed next but one astern of the Lawrence, and was therefore, at the commencement of the action, quite near the commodore, and in a position to accompany him in closing with the enemy. The Niagara did not, however, make sail with the Lawrence, and accompany her down into close action, but continued at long shots, using only her long twelve-pounder.

Meantime, the Lawrence fanned slowly down towards the enemy, suffering terribly. At meridian, supposing himself within range of the carronades, he luffed up and fired the first division on the starboard side. Discovering that his shot did not tell, he bore away again, and continued steadily to approach the enemy until a quarter past meridian, when he opened his whole starboard broadside, and still continued to approach until within about three hundred and fifty yards, when he hauled up on a course parallel to that of the enemy, and opened a rapid and most destructive fire on the Detroit. So steady had been the approach of the Lawrence in bearing down, and so unwavering the purpose of her commander, that the enemy had apprehended an intention to board. Captain Perry's only object had been to get the enemy within effective reach of his carronades, who hitherto had derived great advantage from his superiority in long guns; and a half hour of almost unresisted cannonade upon the Lawrence, from twenty long guns which the British squadron showed on one side in battery, caused great carnage and destruction on board of her.

Nevertheless the action was now commenced from her with spirit and effect; and, notwithstanding the overpowering odds with which she was assailed, the whole battery of the enemy, amounting, in all, to thirty-four guns,<sup>5</sup> being almost entirely directed against her, she continued to assail the enemy with steady and unwavering effort. In this unequal contest she was nobly sustained by the Scorpion and Ariel on her weather bow, which, being but slightly noticed by the enemy or injured by his shot, were enabled to direct their fire upon him with sure aim and without interruption. The commander of the Caledonia, animated by the same gallant spirit and sense of duty, followed the Lawrence into close action, and closed with her antagonist, the Hunter; but the Niagara, which, when the battle began, had been within hail of the Lawrence, did not follow her down towards the enemy's line so as to encounter her antagonist, the Queen Charlotte. She had not made sail when the Lawrence did; but got embarrassed with the Caledonia, instead of passing astern and to leeward of her to close with the Queen Charlotte, which was next to the Hunter. Captain Elliott hailed the Caledonia, and ordered Lieutenant D. Turner to bear up and make room for him to pass. Though this officer was in the station assigned to him astern of the Lawrence, and pressing down to engage his antagonist, the brig Hunter, yet he obeyed the order of his superior, without stopping to inquire whether that superior, as a subordinate like himself, had a right to give an order involving a change in the order of battle. Lieutenant Turner at once put his helm up, and made room for the Niagara by bearing down towards the enemy. Captain Elliott did not, however, follow in the Niagara, but sheered to windward, and, by brailing up his jib and backing his main topsail, balanced the efforts of his sails so as to keep his vessel stationary, and prevent her approaching the enemy. The Niagara did not, therefore, approach the enemy's line near enough to use her carronades, but remained at long shots, firing only her long twelve-pounder, doing little injury, and receiving less from casual shots aimed at the Lawrence and Caledonia, of which she was partially under cover.

At half past twelve, the Queen Charlotte, finding that she could not, with her light guns, engage her expected antagonist, the Niagara, on account of her distance off, filled her main topsail, and, passing the Hunter, closed up astern of the Detroit, and opened her fire at closer quarters upon the Lawrence. In this unequal contest, the Lawrence continued to struggle desperately against such overpowering numbers. The first division of the starboard guns was directed against the Detroit, and the second against the Queen Charlotte, with an occasional shot from her after gun at the Hunter, which lay on her quarter, and with which the Caledonia continued to sustain a hot though unequal engagement. The Scorpion and Ariel, from their stations on the weather bow of the Lawrence, made every effort that their inconsiderable force allowed. The Niagara had taken a station, as we have seen, which prevented her from firing, except with her long gun, on the sternmost of the enemy's vessels. The small vessels at the rear of our own line were too remote to do more than keep up a distant cannonade with the nearest vessels of the enemy.

Overwhelming as was the superiority of the force directed against the Lawrence, being in the ratio of thirty-four guns to her ten in battery, she continued, with the aid of the Scorpion, Ariel, and Caledonia, to sustain the contest for more than two hours, her fire being kept up with uninterrupted spirit, so long as her guns continued mounted and in order. Never was the advantage of thorough training at the guns more exemplified than in the case of the Lawrence. The surgeon remarks that he could discover no perceptible difference in the rapidity of the firing of the guns over his head during the action; throughout, the actual firing seemed as rapid as in exercise before the battle. By this time, however, her rigging had been much shot away, and was hanging down or towing overboard, sails torn to pieces, spars wounded and falling upon deck, braces and bowlines cut, so as to render it impossible to trim the yards or keep the vessel under control. Such was the condition of the vessel aloft; on deck the destruction was even more terrible. One by one the guns were dismounted, until only one remained that could be fired; the bulwarks were so entirely beaten in that the enemy's round shot passed completely through. The slaughter was dreadful, beyond anything recorded in naval history. Of one hundred well men who had gone into action, twenty-two were killed and sixty-one wounded. The killed were hastily removed out of the way of the guns, and the wounded passed below and crowded together on the berth-deck. It was impossible for Doctor Parsons, the assistant surgeon of the Lawrence, the only medical officer who was in health to perform duty in the squadron, to attend to such a press of wounded; bleeding arteries were hastily secured, shattered limbs supported by splints, and those that were nearly severed by cannon-balls hastily removed. Owing to the shallowness of these vessels, the wounded were necessarily all above the water-line, and exposed to be again struck by cannon-balls passing through the vessel's side; thus, midshipman Laub, while moving away from the surgeon, with a tourniquet on his arm, to resume his duties upon deck, was struck by a cannon-ball, which traversed his chest; and a Narraganset Indian, named Charles Poughigh, was killed in like manner by a cannon-ball after his leg had been taken off. Perry had a favourite spaniel on board the

Lawrence, which had been left in a state-room below to be out of the way. The confinement, the noise, and the groans of the wounded, terrified the poor animal, and at each discharge it growled and barked with affected rage, or howled most piteously. In the course of the action, a shot passed through the bulkhead and left a large hole, through which the dog immediately thrust its head, yelping terribly for release. Its strange manoeuvres were too much for the gravity even of the suffering wounded, and some of them broke forth into loud and intemperate laughter. Meantime Perry continued to keep up a fire from his single remaining carronade, though to man it he was obliged to send repeated requests to the surgeon to spare him another hand from those engaged in removing the wounded, until the last had been taken. It is recorded by the surgeon, that when these messages arrived, several of the wounded crawled upon deck to lend a feeble aid at the guns. At length the commander's own personal aid, with that of the purser, Mr. Hambleton, and chaplain, Mr. Breese, was necessary to fire this sole remaining gun, and it, too, was at last disabled.

The conduct of Perry throughout this trying scene was such as to inspire the most unbounded confidence in his followers, and to sustain throughout their courage and enthusiasm. Free from irritation and undue excitability, the necessary orders were given with precision, and obeyed with steady alacrity. Undismayed amid the surrounding carnage, calm, collected, and even cheerful, his eye became the rallying-point to which those of his followers reverted after each new disaster, and received from its electric flash a kindred encouragement. After the fearful havoc which would occasionally be made among a gun's crew by a single round shot, or a stand of grape or canister, the survivors would for a moment turn to Perry, exchange a glance with him, and step into the places of their comrades. Those that lay weltering on the deck, some in the agony of expiring nature, would contrive to get their faces towards him, and, fixing their eye upon his, seem to seek, as an only reward for that life's blood which was ebbing away in the cause of their country, an assurance that they had done their duty. They seemed to die cheerfully in the consciousness that, if they had fallen, his more important life was still spared to secure the triumph of their country.

The humane heart of the commander could not yield to the painful feelings which this spectacle, under other circumstances, would have rendered overpowering. The animating sense of the responsibility that weighed upon him, and confidence in his own resources, enabled him to maintain his cheerfulness. In the hottest of the fight, Yarnall, the first lieutenant, came to Perry, and told him that the officers in the first division under his command were all killed or disabled. Yarnall had received a wound in the forehead and another in the neck, from which the blood flowed profusely over his face and person, while his nose, which had been struck by a splinter, was swollen to a most portentous size. Perry, after expressing some good-humoured astonishment at his tragi-comical appearance, sent him the required aid; but soon after he returned with the same complaint of a destruction of his officers, to which he replied, "You must endeavour to make out by yourself; I have no more to furnish you." In addition to the other oddities of Yarnall's appearance, some of the hammocks were struck in the nettings, and the contents of the mattresses, chiefly stuffed with the down of flag-tops or cat-tails, were distributed in the air, having much the appearance of falling snow. This substance, lighting on Yarnall's face and adhering to the blood, gave it, as Dr. Parsons describes it, the appearance of a huge owl. When he went below at the close of the action, even the wounded were moved to merriment by his ludicrous appearance, and one of them exclaimed, "The devil has come for his own."

Another incident is characteristic of the calm cheerfulness of Perry and of his officers. Dulany Forrest, the second lieutenant, was standing immediately beside Perry, attending to his division, when a grape-shot struck him in the breast, and he fell upon the deck. Perry raised him up, and, observing no appearance of injury—for the shot had spent its force—uttered some cheering assurance to Forrest that he could not be hurt. The lieutenant, who had only been stunned, presently became conscious; and, pulling out the shot, which had lodged in the bosom of his waistcoat, put it quietly in his pocket, replying, "No, sir, I am not hurt, but this is my shot!" Several cases occurred, during this scene of carnage, in which men were shot down while in the act of speaking to the commander. One of these was that of a captain of a gun, which was somewhat out of order, whom Perry had approached to offer assistance. The sailor, who was a noble-looking fellow, being one of the "Constitution's," was in the act of drawing himself up, with a fine, sailorlike air, to fire, when a twenty-four pound shot passed through his body, and he fell without a groan at the feet of his commander.

Another incident no less painfully illustrates the carnage which occurred on the deck of the Lawrence, and the destruction by which her commander was so closely surrounded. The command of the marines of the Lawrence was intrusted to Lieutenant John Brooks, a gay, amiable, and intelligent young officer, whose numerous good qualities were enhanced in their effects by the rarest personal beauty. He was addressing Perry with a smile, and in an animated tone, with regard to the battle, when a cannon ball struck him in the thigh, shattering him in the most horrible manner, and carrying him to the other side of the deck. The sudden torment of his wound wrung from him piercing cries. He implored his commander to relieve him from pain too great for endurance by shooting him dead. Perry ordered some of the marines to take him below. Ere this could be effected, a mulatto boy, only twelve years old, who was Brooks's servant, came with a cartridge to a neighbouring gun, and, seeing Brooks down, threw himself on the deck with frantic cries, exclaiming that his master was killed. When Brooks was taken below, he returned sobbing to his duty. One occurrence for a moment during the action disturbed the settled equanimity of Perry. He beheld his young brother, then but twelve years old, who had already, during the action, received two musket balls through his hat, and had his clothes torn by splinters, suddenly struck down at his side by a hammock torn from the nettings by a cannon ball. Fortunately, the shot itself had missed him. He was only stunned; and, in a few moments, his anxious brother had the satisfaction of seeing him return to his duty.

At length, about half past two, when the last gun of the Lawrence had become disabled and unfit for farther use—when, of all his crew, Captain Perry could only find throughout his vessel eighteen persons, besides his little brother and himself, undisabled by wounds—it became evident to him that he must have recourse to other means within his command in order to win the battle. Repeatedly during the engagement, Mr. Taylor, whose duty as sailing-master placed him beside the commander, to manoeuvre the

Lawrence under his orders, had asked Perry if he observed the conduct of the Niagara, which was lying far to windward, out of reach of the Queen Charlotte, her antagonist, and the very different conduct of the little Caledonia, which had so gallantly borne down to relieve the Lawrence from the enemy's fire. Similar remarks were made among themselves by the officers and crew. The wounded, as they went below, and were asked for news of how the day was going, each had the same tale to relate of the Niagara keeping aloof and failing to relieve the Lawrence from the fire of the Queen Charlotte. As, then, the last gun of the Lawrence became useless, and the ship, now an unmanageable wreck, was beginning to drop astern, Captain Perry was looking around, as the smoke cleared away, to estimate the real condition of his resources, when Lieutenant Forrest again called his attention to the strange manoeuvres of the Niagara, at this time on the larboard beam of the Lawrence, directly opposite to the enemy, while the Caledonia was passing the starboard beam between the Lawrence and the enemy. "That brig," said Forrest, "will not help us; see how he keeps off, he will not come to close action." "I'll fetch him up," was the commodore's reply; and he immediately ordered his boat. He remarked that the Niagara did not appear to be much injured, and that the American flag should not be hauled down from over his head on that day. Giving Mr. Yarnall command of the Lawrence, Perry stepped down the larboard gangway into his boat, telling his officers, as he shoved off, with the prophetic confidence of a hero conscious of his powers, "If a victory is to be gained, I'll gain it!"

At half past two, when Perry left the Lawrence, the Niagara was passing her weather or larboard beam at the distance of nearly half a mile. The breeze had freshened, her main topsail was filled, and she was passing the British squadron rapidly. Elated with the prospect of getting on board of this fresh vessel, and trying his prowess upon the host of enemies, whose efficiency his previous desperate resistance had essentially diminished, he went off in gallant style and full of ardour from the Lawrence, standing erect in his boat, and urging his crew to give way cheerily. The enemy, observing this movement, quickly penetrated his design; and apprehending the consequences of the Niagara, then entirely fresh, passing under the immediate command of the superior officer, who had fought the Lawrence with such skill and obstinacy against the whole British squadron for more than two hours and a half, they immediately directed a fire of great guns and musketry at his boat, and exerted all their energies to destroy it. Several of the oars were splintered, the boat was traversed by musket balls, and the crew covered with spray from the round shot and grape that were striking the water on every side. Perry, unconscious or unmindful of the danger, continued to stand erect, until his brave crew implored him not to expose himself; and, losing for a moment their sense of subordination in sympathy for his danger and anxiety for the periled glory of their country, threatened to lay upon their oar unless he sat down. Thus entreated, he yielded to their wishes; and they gave way with a hearty good-will. The breeze had now freshened, and the Niagara, having set her foresail, was ranging rapidly past the enemy, in a direction which would soon have carried her entirely out of the action. With all the exertions of the boat's crew, nearly fifteen minutes were passed in reaching the Niagara.

By none of the squadron was this critical movement so anxiously watched as by the fourteen brave fellows who alone remained unhurt of the officers and crew of the Lawrence; the life of their beloved commander, tenfold endeared to them by their recent observance of his heroism; the fate of the day; the glory of their country; and their own condition as prisoners or victors, all dependant on that life, wrought their feelings to the most intense and painful sympathy. Powerless to do anything for their own protection or for the farther annoyance of the enemy, they clustered along the weather bulwarks of the Lawrence, and watched each dip of the oars that were carrying Perry along at a rate which seemed slow to their impatience; each ball that seemed destined to destroy him would have been more welcome to themselves. But he moved on unscathed, as amid the wreck of the Lawrence. And now they see him cross the gangway of the Niagara, and their joy bursts forth in enthusiastic cheers.

The feelings of the few survivors and wounded were thus relieved from a painful solicitude amounting to agony. They felt that all was now safe, and that they had not fought, nor their less fortunate shipmates bled and died in vain. While this crisis had absorbed them, the brig, with her colours still flying, had continued to be a principal object for the enemy's fire. It became the duty of Lieutenant Yarnall, as commander, to spare the farther destruction of the brave fellows intrusted to him, and the frightful slaughter of the wounded below. He had a brief consultation with the second lieutenant, Dulany Forrest, and Sailing-master W. V. Taylor, and, with their concurrence, determined to surrender. It may be here remarked that all three of these officers were wounded, though continuing at their posts. The colours were therefore hauled down. Their descent was greeted by cheers from all the British vessels, the crews of which appeared exultingly on their weather bulwarks, waving triumphant defiance at their enemies. But the hope was delusive. The first act was over, and its close had imparted to the British an unsubstantial encouragement; the second was to terminate in a catastrophe not less brilliant than they might have anticipated, but far different. On the berth-deck of the Lawrence, the explanation of the British cheers by the surrender of their vessel had filled the hearts of the wounded, with which the deck was literally covered, with the deepest despondency. The assistance of the humane and indefatigable young surgeon was rejected, and scarcely any exclamations met his ear but "Sink the ship! Let us all sink together!" Such is the desire to conquer, such the heroism of Americans, when trained and inspired by a hero. It was in the midst of this despondency that the chivalrous young Brooks, whose life-blood had been fast ebbing away, breathed forth a spirit worthy of the fair temple in which it was enshrined. Mr. Samuel Hambleton, purser of the Lawrence, who had preferred a post of danger on deck to the usual station of his grade in charge of passing powder below, had received a severe wound in the shoulder, by which it was completely shattered, while working by the side of his noble commander, like a common sailor, at the last gun. For want of space in the wardroom, Hambleton was laid on the same mattress with Brooks, face to face with his dying messmate and friend. The intense suffering which had impelled him, in the first moment of being struck, to ask for death at the hand of his commander, had passed away, and he lay calmly expecting his end. Never before had Hambleton been so much impressed with his surpassing beauty. While the fever from his wound had imparted a surprising lustre to his ordinarily radiant countenance, its expression gave the idea of a spirit sublimated by approaching release from the burden of mortality. The glory of his country, the welfare of his friends—feelings worthy of angels—were still uppermost in his thought. He inquired, with earnest solicitude, how the battle went, and as to the fate of Perry. The Lawrence had surrendered; but Perry had reached the Niagara, to bring her up to take her share in the battle, which, earlier taken, might have spared so many lives. Brooks briefly directed the disposition of his affairs, the messages to be sent to his father and friends, and commended his faithful mulatto boy to their protection and kindness. While he was yet speaking in a failing tone, Hambleton's attention was diverted by favourable news from deck, and the tumultuous excitement of joy which it occasioned among the wounded. When he turned to communicate it to Brooks, his spirit had departed.

But the enemy had other employment than to take possession of the surrendered Lawrence. As Perry reached the deck of the Niagara, he was met at the gangway by Captain Elliott, who "inquired how the day was going. Captain Perry replied, badly: that he had lost almost all of his men, and that his ship was a wreck; and asked what the gunboats were doing so far astern. Captain Elliott offered to go and bring them up; and, Captain Perry consenting, he sprung into the boat and went off on that duty."<sup>6</sup>

Perry's first order on board the Niagara was to back the main topsail, and stop her from running out of the action; his next, to brail up the main topsail, put the helm up, and bear down before the wind, with squared yards, for the enemy, altering the course from that which Captain Elliott had been steering a whole right angle; at the same time, he set top-gallant-sails, and hove out the signal for close action. As the answering pendants were displayed along the line, the order was greeted by hearty cheers, evincive of the admiration awakened throughout the squadron by the hardy manoeuvre of the Niagara, and of renewed confidence of victory. By great efforts, Lieutenant Holdup Stevens, who had been astern of the line in the Trippe, soon closed up to the assistance of the Caledonia, and the remaining vessels approached rapidly, to take a more active part in the battle, under the influence of the increasing breeze.

The helm had been put up on board the Niagara, sail made, and the signal for close action hove out at forty-five minutes after two, the instant after Perry had boarded her. With the increased breeze, seven or eight minutes sufficed to traverse the distance of more than half a mile which still separated the Niagara from the enemy. As the enemy beheld her coming boldly down, reserving her fire until it could be delivered with terrible effect, they poured theirs in upon her in a raking position, and the Detroit made an effort to wear in order to present her starboard broadside to the Niagara, several of the larboard guns being disabled. As this evolution commenced on board the Detroit, the Queen Charlotte was running up under her lee. The evolution of wearing, which should properly have commenced with the sternmost and leewardmost vessel, not having been imitated with sufficient quickness by the Queen, the consequence was, that the latter ran her bowsprit and head booms into the mizzen rigging of the Detroit, and the two British ships got foul of each other, and continued in this unfortunate predicament, when the Niagara, having shortened sail to check her velocity, passed slowly under the bows of the Detroit,<sup>7</sup> within half pistol-shot, and poured into both vessels, as they lay entangled, a deadly and awfully destructive fire of grape and canister; the larboard guns, which were likewise manned, were directed with equally murderous effect into the sterns of the Lady Prevost, which had passed to the head of the line, and the Little Belt; the marines, at the same time, cleared their decks of every one to be seen above the rails. The piercing shrieks of the mortally wounded on every side showed how terrific had been the carnage. Passing under the lee of the two British ships, which had now got clear, but were but slightly separated, Captain Perry, brought by the wind on the starboard tack, with his head to the northward and eastward, and backing the Niagara's main topsail to deaden her headway, continued to pour his starboard broadside into the Queen Charlotte and the Hunter, which lay astern of her. Some of his shots passed through the Queen Charlotte's ports into the Detroit. At this juncture the small vessels also came into close action to windward, and poured in a destructive fire of grape and canister; their shot and that of the Niagara, whenever it missed its mark, passing the enemy, and taking effect reciprocally on our own vessels.

All resistance now ceased; an officer appeared on the taffrail of the Queen, to signify that she had struck; and her example was immediately followed by the Detroit. Both vessels struck in about seven minutes after the Niagara opened this most destructive fire, and about fifteen minutes after Perry took command of her. The Hunter struck at the same time, as did the Lady Prevost, which lay to leeward under the guns of the Niagara.

The battle had begun on the part of the enemy at a quarter before meridian; at three the Queen Charlotte and Detroit surrendered, and all resistance was at an end. As the cannonade ceased and the smoke blew over, the two squadrons, now owning one master, were found completely mingled. The shattered Lawrence, whose condition sufficiently attested where had been the brunt and burden of the day, lay to windward, a tattered and helpless wreck, with the flag of liberty once more flying over her; the Niagara, with the signal for close action still set, lay close under the lee of the Detroit, Queen Charlotte, and Hunter; the Caledonia, Scorpion, and Trippe, which had gallantly followed the Niagara through the enemy's line, had taken a position to leeward very favourable for preventing the enemy's escape. As the smoke passed to leeward, the Chippeway and Little Belt were discovered bearing up towards Malden under a press of sail. The Scorpion and Trippe went immediately in pursuit, and, after a few shots, compelled them to surrender.

And now began the proud yet melancholy task of taking possession of the enemy's ships. On boarding the Detroit, the officer sent from the Niagara found her in a condition only less pitiable than the Lawrence had been left, in by Perry; her gaff and mizzen topmast hanging over the taffrail and quarter; her masts and yards badly wounded; all her braces shot away, not a single stay standing forward, and her stout oak bulwarks very much shattered. Many of the thirty-two pound shots were sticking in her side; they had been fired from the carronades before the Lawrence had got to close quarters. On deck the destruction and carnage had been terrible; many of the guns were dismounted, and the deck was strewn with the killed and wounded, and slippery with blood. The deck was found nearly deserted of officers and men, and in charge of the second lieutenant, Mr. Inglis, the first lieutenant having been killed towards the middle of the action, and Commodore Barclay having been most dangerously wounded somewhat earlier by a grape shot in the thigh. This heroic officer, after having been carried below and placed in the hands of the surgeon, made use of the first moment of returning consciousness to cause himself to be again borne upon deck. When the Niagara bore down and delivered her raking fire, he received a second grape shot in the right shoulder, which, entering below the joint, broke the blade to pieces, and left a large and dreadful wound. It is said that when, towards the close of the action, a message was sent down to this heroic officer that the day was lost, he caused himself to be carried once more on deck, to convince himself that farther resistance was impossible and would be unavailing.

The other British vessels were found to be also much cut to pieces, especially the Queen Charlotte, which had lost her brave commander, Captain Finnis, very early in the action; her first lieutenant had been soon after mortally wounded, and the loss of life on board of her was very severe; she was also much cut to pieces both in hull and spars. The other vessels suffered in like proportion; the Lady Prevost had both her commander and first lieutenant wounded, and, besides other extensive injury, was become unmanageable from the loss of her rudder; Lieutenants Bignal, commanding the Hunter, and Campbell, the Chippeway, were also wounded; thus leaving only the commander of the Little Belt fit for duty at the close of the action. Indeed, in the official account of Commodore Barclay, it is stated that every commander, and every officer second in command, was disabled. The total of killed and wounded rendered by Commodore Barclay in his official report were forty-one killed, including three officers, and ninety-four wounded, nine of whom were officers. The returns, on account of the condition of the commanders and their seconds in command, could not have been very complete, and the numbers of killed and wounded are believed to have been greater. The killed of the British squadron were thrown overboard as they fell, with the exception of the officers.

The feeling which the spectacle of these prizes awakened in the minds of the victors had in it as much of sorrow as of exultation. The ruined and tattered condition of that squadron, which, three short hours before, had presented itself in such proud array, beginning the action, and hurling death and defiance at those who, with inferior force, had ventured to brave the power of England; and, still more, the spectacle of bloodshed and agony which they everywhere presented within, after the excitement of battle was over, could not but overwhelm the mind with gloom, and make way once more for the indulgence of those humane sympathies which had been smothered in the strife of conflict. Nor did our own ships fail to exhibit scenes well suited to harrow the feelings; the Lawrence especially presented an awful spectacle. As has been already stated, twenty-two of her crew were killed and sixty-one wounded, making an aggregate of slaughter which is believed never to have been surpassed in any modern naval combat, unless where the conquered vessel has sunk with her whole crew. The Niagara lost two killed and twenty-three wounded; all but two of the wounded having been struck after Captain Perry took command of her, as stated by the surgeon who attended them. Three were wounded on board of the Caledonia; two on board the Somers; one killed and three wounded on board the Ariel; two killed on board the Scorpion; and two wounded on board the Trippe; making an aggregate in the whole squadron of twenty-seven killed and ninety-six wounded. Among our killed we had to mourn the loss of Lieutenant John Brooks and Midshipman Laub on board the Lawrence; and of Midshipman John Clark on board the Scorpion. Lieutenants Yarnall and Forrest, Sailing-master Taylor, Purser Hambleton, Midshipman Swartout and Claxton, and Mr. Stone, carpenter, were wounded on board the Lawrence, and Lieutenant Edwards and Midshipman Cummings were wounded on board the Niagara. Two of the schooners, the Tigress and Porcupine, had no casualties whatever; and as the Trippe and Somers had each but two wounded, it shows that, notwithstanding the great efforts made by their commanders to close up, they were unable to take an important part in the battle until just before the enemy struck. The Trippe, though originally the last in the line, from her superior sailing, and the great exertions of her commander, Lieutenant Holdup Stevens, was the first of the four sternmost vessels to get into close action. From the enemy's awaiting the attack in a compact line of battle, his vessels were all equally available from the first; and, accordingly, the destruction on board of them, from their want of bulwarks, was more severe than in his heavy vessels. Hence, in addition to the actual inferiority of our force, the disparity was farther increased during the action by its being fought by the whole of the British force, and only a part of ours.

The splendour of this victory dazzles the imagination. It was gained by a portion of an inferior squadron over another every way superior, and throughout the action concentrated in its force.<sup>8</sup> It was gained, more eminently than any other naval victory, by the exertions of one individual, a young man of twenty-seven, who had never beheld a naval engagement. He had dashed boldly into action with the Lawrence, counting upon the support of those immediately around him, and trusting that the rear of his line would soon be able to close up to his support. Deserted by the Niagara, which was to have encountered the second of the enemy's ships, and sustained only by the Caledonia, the Ariel, and the Scorpion, we find him resisting for more than two hours the whole of the British squadron. Finding, at length, his vessel cut to pieces, his guns dismantled, means of resistance destroyed, and nearly the whole of his brave crew lying dead or wounded around him, instead of yielding the day, after having done everything that depended upon him to win it, and leaving the responsibility of defeat to the commander of the Niagara, he thought only of using the means that remained to him still to secure a victory. Passing from the Lawrence under the enemy's fire; saved from death, as if miraculously, by the protecting genius of his country, he reached the Niagara, and, by an evolution unsurpassed for genius and hardihood, bore down upon the enemy, and dashed with his fresh and uninjured vessel through the enemy's line. It was thus that the battle of Erie was won, not merely by the genius and inspiration, but eminently by the exertions of one man. Nelson was indeed a splendid hero, the subject, in no slight degree, of Perry's admiration. But it may with truth be said, that no one of his many brilliant victories was opposed by so many difficulties, or effected by so many resources of genius. They were usually effected by single combined movements in execution of previously-concerted plans. Nelson would go into action at the head of his line, be gallantly supported by his subordinate chiefs, and the steady display of British courage and superior skill would give him the victory. In Perry's victory, the original intention of engaging the enemy in line, vessel to vessel, as designated in previous orders, had failed, from the Niagara keeping back and abstaining from the encounter of her proper antagonist, which was thus left free to aid in overpowering the Lawrence. In suffering destruction, she had fought with desperate obstinacy, and dealt many and formidable blows to her numerous assailants. Overcome at last and abandoned to her fate, Perry made a new arrangement of his remaining resources, and snatched from the enemy a victory which he had already claimed with exulting cheers for his own. Nelson had triumphed over Frenchmen and Spaniards; Perry was called upon to meet the conquerors of these, led, moreover, by a veteran formed in the school of Nelson, and bearing upon his person the marks of Nelson's greatest victory. The battle of Trafalgar was won by the whole British fleet over a part of that of the allies; the battle of Lake Erie was won over the whole British squadron by only a part of ours.

Let us now follow the movements of Perry subsequent to the victory. After the enemy's colours had been hauled down, and provision had been made for officering and manning the prizes, confining the prisoners, securing the wounded masts, stopping shotholes, and the combined squadron had been hauled by the wind on the starboard tack, he retired to the cabin to communicate briefly to General Harrison intelligence of an event which was to admit of the immediate advance of his army, and rescue our territory from the savage warfare which the surrender of Hull's army and subsequent disasters had entailed on it. The letter which he wrote, though short, was ample, since it expressed all that was necessary to be known.

"Dear General,

"We have met the enemy, and they are ours. Two ships, two brigs, one schooner, and one sloop. Yours, with very great respect and esteem,

"O. H. Perry."

He also wrote the following letter to the secretary of the navy, which was forwarded by the same express.

U. S. brig Niagara, off the westernmost Sister, head of Lake Erie, Sept. 10, 1813, 4 P. M.

"Sir,

"It has pleased the Almighty to give to the arms of the United States a signal victory over their enemies on this lake. The British squadron, consisting of two ships, two brigs, one schooner, and one sloop, have this moment surrendered to the force under my command, after a sharp conflict.

"I have the honour to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"O. H. Perry."

Nothing can be more beautifully conspicuous or more characteristic than the blended modesty and piety of this celebrated letter, written without deliberation, in the moment of victory, and in the midst of abundant occupation. In ascribing the victory to the Almighty gift, he was not using a simple form of speech, which would appear gracefully and flatter the strongly religious feelings of the country, but giving vent to a spontaneous impulse of his heart. He keeps all allusion to himself out of sight; self is nowhere referred to, except when he unavoidably characterizes the squadron as being under his command, and the simple words "a sharp conflict" alone convey any idea of the desperate struggle in which his own courage and genius had been so ascendant.

Having despatched these letters by express, he made signal to anchor, for the greater facility of providing for the comfort of the wounded, the security of the prisoners, and the general reorganization of the squadron. Soon after, he visited the Ariel, and despatched Sailing-master Brownell to take charge of the Somers, to which he subsequently ordered seventy prisoners to be removed from the large vessels. Forty of them were ironed or confined below; the remainder were arranged within the circle of the long gun, in a sitting posture, while the crew remained under arms during the night, forming bulwarks across the deck, and ready to fire at the least indication of a disposition to rise. Having completed some other arrangements for the safe keeping of the prisoners in other vessels, Perry returned to the Lawrence, to be again among his brave shipmates, and to do what he was able for their succour. It was proper also that he should receive in his own ship the surrender of the prizes by their commanders, and that the brave fellows who had done most to win the victory should behold the proud but mournful ceremony by which it was completed. From Doctor Parsons, to whom the writer has been indebted for valuable aid in every stage of his undertaking, he has the following brief yet impressive description of Perry's return to the Lawrence: "It was a time of conflicting emotions when the commodore returned to the ship. The battle was won; he was safe. But the deck was slippery with blood and brains, and strewn with the bodies of twenty officers and men, some of whom had sat at table with us at our last meal, and the ship resounded everywhere with the groans of the wounded. Those of us who were spared and able to walk, approached him as he came over the ship's side, but the salutation was a silent one on both sides: not a word could find utterance."

Perry, at the request of his officers, had hitherto worn a uniform round jacket; he now resumed his undress uniform, and, standing on the afterpart of the deck, received the officers of the different captured vessels as they came to tender the surrender of their vessels and their own submission as prisoners. At the head of them was an officer of the forty-first regiment, who acted as marine officer on board the Detroit, and was charged by Commodore Barclay with the delivery of his sword; he was in full dress. When they had approached, picking their way among the wreck and carnage of the deck, they held their swords with the hilts towards Perry, and tendered them to his acceptance. With a dignified and solemn air, the most remote possible from any betrayal of exultation, and in a low tone of voice, he requested them to retain their sidearms; inquired with deep concern for Commodore Barclay and the wounded officers, tendering to them every comfort his ship afforded, and expressing his regret that he had not a spare medical officer to send to them. As it was impossible to reserve all the killed of the Lawrence for burial on shore, the seamen were buried at nightfall alongside, the able-bodied of the crew, so much less numerous than the killed, being assembled around to perform the last sad offices. The burial-service of the Church of England was read over them by the chaplain, Mr. Breese, and they were committed to the deep. These painful duties, the eventful occupations of the day, the condition of the vessel, and the uninterrupted groans of the wounded and dying, gave a melancholy tone to the conversation of the commander and his few officers assembled together on the quarter-deck. To be among the very few spared from death and mutilation, the chances of which he had encountered on that day in so many ways, called for no little gratitude from Perry. His little brother, only twelve years old, though he had received several musket-balls through his dress, had met with no injury, and was now dozing in his hammock. An allusion to these facts awakened the same sense of a controlling Providence, which, in beginning his report, had led him to ascribe the victory to the pleasure of the Almighty. "I believe," he said, "that my wife's prayers have saved me."

Perry now retired to his cot, less, perhaps, to sleep than to dwell on the proud yet painful events of the day; to think of that loved one, to the interposition of whose prayers he attributed his preservation through so many perils, and with whom the victory which he had won would admit of his speedy reunion, and of the children for whom he had that day founded the honourable inheritance of an illustrious name. If the fatigues and exertions of a day thus spent claimed for him the respite of sleep, the toils, the perplexities, the heroism of the preceding hours must have mingled with and disturbed his slumbers, and made him live over again the anxieties of that desperate struggle.

On the following morning the commodore removed to the Ariel, having determined, as the Lawrence was completely disabled for all farther service, to make her an hospital ship, and despatch her with our wounded to Erie. His extreme solicitude, however, brought him back to the Lawrence in the course of the day to inquire into the condition of his wounded shipmates, and encourage them under the operations which many of them were obliged to undergo. Dr. Parsons, assistant-surgeon of the Lawrence, was the only surgical officer of the three belonging to the vessels who was in a condition to perform duty in a squadron having ninety-six wounded, and a still greater number ill with fevers and dysentery. His presence on board of the Lawrence, where most of the wounds had occurred, was a fortunate circumstance. He had removed a few limbs nearly severed by cannon balls during the action, and confined his attention to the sufficiently-engrossing task of securing bleeding arteries. During the night of the tenth his attention was almost constantly required in administering opiates and cordials, and arresting renewed bleeding among the wounded. At daylight on the following morning he had his first patient on the table for amputation, and by eleven o'clock had completed all the amputations. It is mentioned by this gentleman that the greatest impatience existed among this class of wounded to meet the operation, and the only way of satisfying the candidates for the loss of an arm or a leg was to take them in the order in which they had been wounded. At ten o'clock in the evening a few of the more slightly wounded still remained unattended to, when the surgeon was obliged to desist, from inability longer to sustain himself in a stooping position, and from mere physical exhaustion. The remaining wounded of the Lawrence, with the wounded of the rest of the squadron, were only seen on the following day. It is conclusive as to the rare skill of Doctor Parsons, and his humane attentions to the wounded, that out of the whole ninety-six, only three died; one of these was midshipman Thomas Claxton, a young officer of merit and great promise. This extraordinary success must have been chiefly owing to the skill and watchful attention of the young surgeon, though he modestly attributes it to "their being abundantly supplied with fresh provisions, to a pure atmosphere under an awning upon deck, to the cheerful state of mind occasioned by victory, and to the devoted attention of the commodore to every want."

In the course of this day Perry visited Commodore Barclay on board of the Detroit, and from that visit, so tragically ushered in, began a warm and enduring friendship. Every comfort that Perry could procure for his wounded prisoner was freely placed at his disposal. He became responsible for a considerable sum of money required by Barclay for his own use and that of his officers; and, at Barclay's request, also advanced money to the army officers employed in his squadron. Some difficulties had occurred at that period with regard to the treatment of prisoners between the two nations, owing to some alleged cruelties against our captured countrymen. Still, in order to relieve the mind of Barclay while suffering from his wounds, and under a conviction that nothing but a return to his country could restore him, Perry pledged himself that he should be paroled; and wrote with such urgency to the secretary of the navy and the commissary of prisoners in Barclay's behalf, making his request as a personal favour to himself, the only one that he had to ask, that it was eventually obtained.

While Perry was on board the Detroit on his visit to Barclay, two strange beings were brought to him, who had been found in the depths of the hold, where they had remained without food since the action. They proved to be Indian chiefs, ludicrously clad in sailor's clothes, in which they appeared very ill at their ease. With others of their nation, they had been embarked in the British squadron to act in the tops as sharp-shooters. These savages, who had the reputation of braves in their tribe, and who would probably have suffered scalping or met death with composure, surrounded with every torture that barbarity like their own could devise, were completely unnerved, when the battle became warm, by the crash and destruction around them. Panic-struck by the unaccustomed perils to which they were exposed, they fled with precipitation to the lowest part of the hold, whence they were drawn forth more dead than alive. When brought before Perry, they expected nothing short of torture and scalping; but were no less relieved than astonished when, after a few good-humored words, he directed them to be fed and made comfortable. Soon after he set them on shore, furnished, at their desire, with a particular request to General Harrison that they might be carefully protected from our friendly Indians.

At nine o'clock on the morning of the eleventh, the two squadrons weighed anchor and stood towards Putin Bay, where they arrived after a sail of two hours. The burial of the officers who had fallen in battle took place on the morning of the twelfth. The day was serene, and the lake unruffled by a breeze. The boats, with their crews neatly dressed, and their colours halfmasted, conveyed the bodies to the shore, keeping time, with a measured stroke, to the mournful death-dirge. The procession formed, as it reached the shore, according to rank, in reversed order. The youngest of the killed was borne first, then the lowest in rank of the other squadron, and so on alternately, an American and a British corpse, the body of Captain Finnis coming last. As the corpses moved on, the officers fell into procession, two Americans and two English, according to rank reversed, Perry himself closing the procession. As the mournful pageant advanced, keeping time to the measured cadence of a dead march from the drums and fifes of both squadrons, minute guns, fired alternately from each, offered the appropriate tribute of respect to the remains of the departed.

At length the procession reached the spot, near the margin of the lake, where the graves had been prepared for the reception of the dead. The funeral service was read over them, and they were lowered into the earth in the order in which they had been borne. Volleys of musketry over the graves closed the mournful ceremony. The reflections with which a man of eminently humane feelings, of serious and contemplative mind like Perry, must have gazed upon such a scene, could have been of no ordinary character. The same expression of melancholy and regret at the loss of shipmates and valued friends, pervading alike the countenances of the conquerors and the conquered; identity of physiognomy marking them for descendants of the same race; the same language, in its noblest form—the funeral-service of the Church of England—sounding in their ears with equal familiarity, as if to contradict the enmity which the lifeless bodies at their feet too painfully attested. Did his eye wander beyond, it took in the peaceful surface of the lake and the shattered vessels of either squadron, from which came alternately the melancholy boom of the minute gun. As the young commander returned to his boat, exultation, if it found any existence in his bosom at such a moment, must have blended itself with many contending emotions.

THE important consequences of the victory on Lake Erie might well justify the pious exclamation in which Perry announced it to the secretary of the navy: "It has pleased the Almighty to give to the arms of the United States a signal victory over their enemies." While a defeat would have given to the enemy the command of all the lakes, by enabling him to concentrate his forces in succession on Lakes Ontario and Champlain, and thus laid our whole frontier open to his incursions, victory, on the contrary, on this lake involved remotely the possibility of triumph on all the others, while it led immediately to the evacuation of Detroit and the release of the whole territory of Michigan from the occupation of the British army, and from the horrors of the firebrand and scalping-knife which its allies had rendered but too familiar there. The heroism of Perry, while restoring to us all that Hull's incapacity had lost, wiped away the stigma of his inglorious surrender, and left a fund of encouragement to give impulse to our arms. The blow, followed up with vigour, not only facilitated the immediate overthrow of the British power in Upper Canada and on all the lakes, but left us without limits to the extension of our conquests. One of the first and most important consequences that must necessarily follow it was the the advancement of General Harrison's army into the enemy's territory. In order to transport the army to Malden, where the main body of the British army then lay, and which it was designed to get possession of before ascending the lake towards Detroit, Perry made haste to prepare the Niagara, and the light vessels of both squadrons, for immediate service; he removed the whole of our wounded to the Lawrence, and the whole of the British wounded to the Detroit and the Queen Charlotte. The last two vessels were snugly moored in the inner bay for their greater security.

The thirteenth of September was ushered in by a violent gale from the southwest, which created a heavy sea in the bay. This was too distressing to the shattered masts of the Detroit, notwithstanding the efforts which had been made to secure them. They fell with a violent crash on the decks, and rendered the wreck and desolation complete. The disaster had been foreseen, and the prize crew had placed themselves in safety. The main and mizzen masts of the Queen Charlotte fell in like manner.

In the course of this day Perry found leisure to draw up and despatch a detailed report of the battle to the secretary of the navy, together with statements of the relative forces of the two squadrons, and of our killed and wounded. This report is admirable for the modesty which everywhere pervaded it, so far as he was himself concerned; merely confining himself, with regard to his own movements, to a simple relation of the most important facts; and evincing his desire to make all under his orders appear advantageously. To this desire was owing the notice which he took of Captain Elliott, which, without being very eulogistic, was suited, on the whole, to prevent conveying any unfavourable impression of his conduct. He stated that, "at half past two, the wind springing up, Captain Elliott was enabled to bring his vessel, the Niagara, gallantly into close action. I immediately went on board of her, when he anticipated my wish by volunteering to bring the schooners, which had been kept astern by the lightness of the wind, into close action." He leaves to Captain Elliott the benefit of the inference that, more than two hours after the Lawrence had been in close action, he actually did what he was enabled to do; which, by the concurrent testimony of the officers of the squadron, except a few of those of the Niagara, he never did. After commending the various officers of the squadron who had distinguished themselves, he thus closed with a notice of Captain Elliott, of whom he could not avoid speaking without necessarily implying misconduct. "Of Captain Elliott, already so well known to the government, it would be almost superfluous to speak; in this action he evinced his characteristic bravery and judgment; and, since the close of the action, has given me the most able and essential assistance." This report was seen by Captain Elliott, to whom, as second in command, this courtesy might, under ordinary circumstances, be considered due. When he had read it, Perry asked him if it was a correct statement; Captain Elliott assented; but, after a little time and a reproof, he did not like the manner in which Perry spoke of the Niagara, and asked him if he could not alter it. Perry said he would take time to reflect, and, if he could alter it with propriety, he would do so. Failing in obtaining more favourable mention of himself—for Perry was convinced, upon reflection, that he had already said too much for him—Captain Elliott procured some alterations to be made in the report relating to others. At his suggestion, some laudatory remarks were inserted as to the conduct of Acting-master Nelson Webster; and, in consequence of his attributing misconduct to the commanders of the small vessels which he had gone to the rear of the line to bring up, Perry omitted all mention of their commanders. This omission he subsequently regretted, as he was afterward led to believe that they had failed in no exertion to close up, especially Lieutenant Holdup Stevens, the commander of the Trippe, who, as he ascertained from Lieutenant Turner and others, had brought his vessel into action with special gallantry. This omission gave great pain to the relations of Mr. Stevens, and produced anxious letters from them to Captain Perry, which he was happy in being able to answer most satisfactorily by placing Lieutenant Stevens in a true and meritorious light. Captain Elliott's attempt thus to destroy Lieutenant Stevens can only be accounted for by an inveterate dislike, and appears to be in some way connected with the removal of this officer a few days before from the Niagara, of which he was previously first lieutenant. Of the conduct during the action of this gentleman's successor, Lieutenant J. E. Smith, who had exchanged with Mr. Stevens, Captain Elliott also spoke to Captain Perry in the most disparaging terms; but the latter, having observed that Mr. Smith did his duty while the Niagara was in a far more critical position than during the time of Captain Elliott's being on board of her, noticed his conduct with approbation.<sup>1</sup> It thus appears, that while Perry was torturing his ingenuity to keep honestly out of view the palpable misconduct of Captain Elliott, he on the contrary, was endeavouring to ruin his inferiors.

As the happiness of Captain Perry was afterward imbittered by the annoyances which grew out of a controversy forced upon him by Captain Elliott, as to his share in this victory, and as unavoidable notice must be taken of it hereafter, it is necessary to trace the origin of the difficulty. Captain Elliott appears to have arrived on Lake Erie with a feeling of jealousy towards Captain Perry, an exaggerated idea of the distinction conferred upon him by the capture of the Detroit and Caledonia, and a feeling that injustice had been done to him in not conferring on him the chief command of the squadron on Lake Erie. While, therefore, Perry was happy to receive an officer of greater experience than those who had hitherto been sent to him, and was disposed to welcome him cordially, Captain Elliott, on the contrary, joined the command with a feeling of jealousy towards his superior, and a disposition to be insubordinate. Very soon after he joined the squadron, he had a difficulty with a commander of one of the smaller vessels about receiving a seaman, which that officer scrupled to deliver without a written order, when, instead of reporting the circumstances as they had occurred to their commander, he thus dictatorially addressed him.

U. S. brig Niagara, August 19, 1813.

"Sir,

"I hereby require of you the arrest of Sailingmaster Thomas C. Almy, who has committed a breach of the first clause of the fourteenth article for the better government of the Navy of the United States.

"Respectfully, I have the honour to be,

"Jesse D. Elliott, Lieut."

"Captain O. H. Perry."

Captain Perry seems to have taken no offense at this insubordinate and disrespectful requisition, by which his inferior undertook to deprive him of the power of exercising any judgment as to questions of discipline arising among his officers, and to decide at once as to an alleged offense and the degree of punishment to be awarded to it. He so far yielded, however, to Captain Elliott's demand, as to arrest the officer in question; he subsequently adjusted the difficulty, and took measures, by the issue of a general order, to prevent its recurrence. His conduct in this and in other matters evinced towards Captain Elliott a spirit of forbearance and conciliation. This spirit, added to an eminently humane and generous feeling, continued to animate him towards this officer in the very peculiar situation in which he found himself after the battle.

During the battle, and immediately after it, the extraordinary conduct of Captain Elliott, in failing to follow his chief into close action, to seek out his designated opponent, and to relieve the Lawrence from her unequal contest with the whole British squadron, had been the subject of universal remark, and of the severest animadversion. The opinion was general in the squadron that Captain Elliott had either been actuated by cowardice, or by a treacherous desire to see the Lawrence overpowered and her commander slain, that he might take his station, and, by winning the victory, become the hero of the day.<sup>2</sup> As, however, the chances of victory were almost annihilated by the destruction of the Lawrence, the last supposition met with little belief. These reports were not unknown to Captain Perry, though he discouraged their circulation. He had been perplexed during the action by the unaccountable manoeuvres of the Niagara, when he observed them himself, or when his attention was called to them by others; but he was unwilling to believe in the existence of such motives as were generally ascribed to Captain Elliott. He felt a generous indisposition to permit the fall of a young officer, then high in the public favour, whom he had the power of saving; and, even putting the worst construction on the conduct of Captain Elliott, he was unwilling that the enemy should know that the second in command in our squadron had failed in his duty. In expressing his doubts on this subject to his intimate friend, Mr. Hambleton, while in the act of drawing up his report, he quoted to him, with approbation, the declaration of an English admiral, "It is better to screen a coward than to let the enemy know there is one in the fleet."

Influenced by this motive of national and professional pride, and the generous and humane desire of saving a young officer from irretrievable ruin and disgrace, Perry noticed the conduct of Elliott not only without reprobation, but in the qualified terms of praise that we have quoted. The difficulty and doubt under which he laboured are evident on a careful perusal of his report. Nor was this all that he did; through Lieutenant Turner and Mr. Hambleton he intimated his desire to the officers of his own ship, and of the squadron generally, that they should abstain, both in their letters and in conversation, from all remarks on the conduct of Captain Elliott. He said, that whatever might have been the appearances during the action, he was unwilling after its happy result, to ruin an officer of rank and favourable standing. The American flag, he remarked, had gained honour enough on that day to permit its being shared by all who had served under it. In consequence of this statement of the wishes of their beloved commander, the officers suppressed the letters which they had written to their friends, describing the battle and stigmatizing the conduct of Captain Elliott. Hearing, moreover, subsequently, that reports of his having failed to do his duty prevailed throughout General Harrison's army, Perry spoke to Lieutenant Turner on the subject, expressing the regret which these reports caused him, and his desire that they might be silenced. He requested Lieutenant Turner to visit the camp, and do all that he could with propriety to counteract them. Sharing the noble generosity of his commander, Mr. Turner complied with this request on the following morning. Such were the magnanimous motives which led Perry, after a long mental conflict between justice on the one side, and humane feelings and patriotic pride on the other, to convey, in his official report, a favourable impression of Captain Elliott's conduct during the battle, and otherwise to exert himself, with benevolent solicitude, to screen him from exposure and reprobation.

Captain Elliott was necessarily not long in discovering the unfavourable impression made by his conduct during the battle. He had taken to his bed less from sickness than chagrin, as stated by the surgeon, Dr. Parsons, who was obliged to abandon the urgent claims of the wounded to visit Captain Elliott, and who had not yet been able to attend to one of the really sick. On this occasion Captain Elliott spoke disparagingly to Dr. Parsons of his own surgeon, Dr. Barton; said he was good for nothing; that he had attempted to amputate an arm during the battle, but the man died before it closed. Dr. Parsons told him that Dr. Barton was sick, but would soon be better, and able to discharge his duty faithfully.<sup>2</sup>

Perry soon after visited Captain Elliott, and found him in this condition, and was moved by his declaration that he had lost the fairest opportunity of distinguishing himself that man ever had, to make every effort to relieve him.<sup>3</sup> When, therefore, he soon after received from Captain Elliott a request that he would state what had been his conduct during the battle, influenced by the same generous motives, he replied to him in terms of approbation, which he subsequently lived to repent. Captain Elliott's letter was in the following words, copied from the original in the writer's possession:

U. S. ship Niagara, Sept. 19, 1813.

"Dear Sir,

"My brother, who has this evening arrived from the interior of the country, has mentioned to me a report that appeared to be in general circulation, that, in the late action with the British fleet, my vessel betrayed a want of conduct in bringing into action, and that your vessel was sacrificed in consequence of a want of exertion on my part individually. I will thank you if immediately you will, with candour, name to me my exertions, and that of my officers and crew.

"Yours
respectfully,
"Jesse D.
Elliott."<sup>4</sup>

"An immediate answer is desired.
"Captain O. H. Perry, Ariel."

Captain Elliott's letter was probably dated on the eighteenth, which is endorsed on the back of it, instead of the nineteenth; the date is indistinctly written, and appears to have been altered from the seventeenth to the nineteenth. Captain Perry's reply was as follows.

U. S. schooner Ariel, Put-in Bay, Sept. 19, 1813.

"Dear Sir,

"I received your note last evening after I had turned in, or I should have answered it immediately. I am indignant that any report should be in circulation prejudicial to your character, as respects the action of the tenth instant. It affords me pleasure that I have it in my power to assure you, that the conduct of yourself, officers, and crew was such as to meet my warmest approbation. And I consider the circumstance of your volunteering and bringing the smaller vessels to close action as contributing largely to our victory. I shall ever believe it a premeditated plan of the enemy to disable our commanding vessel, by bringing all their force to bear upon her; and I am satisfied, had they not pursued this course, the engagement would not have lasted thirty minutes. I have no doubt, if the Charlotte had not made sail and engaged the Lawrence, the Niagara would have taken her in twenty minutes.

"Respectfully, &c,
"O. H. Perry."

"Captain Jesse D. Elliott, U.S. ship Niagara."

The motives which prompted Perry to write this letter were the same that influenced him in making out his official report, and in requesting his officers to abstain, in their letters and in conversation, from writing or saying anything to the disadvantage of Captain Elliott. That Perry made a great mistake in writing this letter, and even committed a great fault, cannot be denied. Having, however, gone so far in his official report, it was natural that he should go on, though the warmth of his expressions must be condemned. Before the days of Rodney and Nelson, misconduct, growing chiefly, perhaps, out of defective tactics, was far from uncommon in the British navy; yet the circumstance of Admiral

Hawke having, in his official report, boldly accused one of his captains of neglect of duty in the general engagement with the French fleet under M. de l'Entendiere in 1747, is mentioned by naval historians as distinguishing that report from almost every other on similar occasions. It is due to Perry, that what he himself said to his most intimate friend, Mr. Hambleton, in palliation of his mistake, when the person for whose benefit it had been committed had given him cause for repentance, should be placed before the reader. "It was a matter of great doubt, when I began to reflect upon Captain Elliott's conduct, to what to attribute his keeping so long out of the action. It was difficult to believe that a man, who, as I then thought, had, in a former instance, behaved bravely, could act otherwise in a subsequent action. I did not then know enough of human nature to believe that any one could be so base as to be guilty of the motive which some ascribed to him, namely, a determination to sacrifice me by keeping his vessel out of action.

"On the evening of the action I was elated with our success, which had relieved me from a load of responsibility, and from a situation, standing as I did with the government, almost desperate. At such a moment there was not a person in the world whose feelings I would have hurt. On showing Captain Elliott the rough draught of my official letter, when I asked him if it was a correct statement, he assented; but, after a little time, did not like the manner in which I spoke of the Niagara, and asked me if I could not alter it. I told him I thought not, but would take time to reflect, and, if I could with propriety, would do so. Upon reflection, I was sensible I had already said and done too much.

Subsequently I became involved in his snares; and, on his writing me a note, of which he has published only a part, I was silly enough to write him in reply the foolish letter of the nineteenth of September, because I thought it necessary to persevere in endeavouring to save him. This undoubtedly reflects on my head, but surely not on my heart. I was willing enough to share with him and others the fame I had acquired. Although, my friend, I never have arrogated to myself superior judgment—on the contrary, am aware of my weakness in being very credulous—yet I was certainly as capable of deciding, after reflection, on events that occurred under my own eyes as any other in the squadron, and the opinions of others had nothing to do with mine as respects Captain Elliott. Although my want of judgment may cause regret to my friends, yet no one can reflect on the goodness of my heart and the correctness of my principles."

On the same day that Perry wrote his unfortunate letter in behalf of Captain Elliott, the Lawrence weighed anchor for Erie with the sick and wounded of the American squadron. Captain Perry went on board of her as she was sailing out of the harbour, to take leave of his brave shipmates, and to see if anything farther could be done for their comfort. He had already taken every possible pains to procure whatever refreshments the neighbourhood of Sandusky afforded for his own and the British wounded, and placed his own private stores at the disposal of the surgeon of the Lawrence, by whom they were freely used. Before leaving the Lawrence, Perry, true to his generous wish to save the reputation of Captain Elliott, requested Mr. Hambleton to desire the wounded officers, on their landing, to avoid any remarks or conversation with regard to the misconduct of the Niagara while under the command of Captain Elliott, and asked him particularly to caution Lieutenant Forrest, who was to proceed to Washington on the proud errand of delivering the captured colours of the enemy, to abstain from any discussion of the subject.

The generous effort made by Perry to exhibit the conduct of Captain Elliott in a light not obviously unfavourable in his official report; the letter which, in the same spirit, he wrote at Captain Elliott's request, to relieve the anxiety and distress of mind under which he was suffering, and his earnest efforts to influence the officers under his command in behalf of Captain Elliott's reputation, would doubtless have attained their object, and left that gentleman in possession of an enviable reputation, had he been satisfied to allow the whole matter to remain in the position in which it was thus left; but the efforts which should have awakened the keenest sense of gratitude on the part of Captain Elliott, in the language of an accurate observer, "appear to have planted in his bosom the most implacable hatred." It will be seen, in the sequel, that this was not long in exhibiting itself.

Before resuming the course of our narrative, we will here refer to another matter of a painful nature, though connected with an exhibition of feelings suited to awaken admiration instead of disgust. By the Lawrence Captain Perry forwarded to General Brooks, of Medford, Massachusetts, the following feeling announcement of the death of his noble son:

"It is with heartfelt pain I am under the necessity of communicating to you the irreparable loss which you and our country have sustained in the death of your gallant and worthy son, Lieutenant John Brooks, who fell in the action with the British squadron at the head of Lake Erie, on the tenth instant, while nobly animating his men to their duty. His friend, Mr. Hambleton, who is severely wounded, will write you the moment he is able. I sympathize with you most deeply."

Ere this letter could reach the bereaved parent, he had addressed Perry on the same subject. It is a characteristic specimen of the noble patriotism which animated those who won our independence with their blood; of a devotion, willing not merely to sacrifice life in our country's cause, but to acquiesce, with at least outward cheerfulness, in the sacrifice of the life of a son. The veteran's letter ran as follows:

"After offering you my most cordial congratulations on your late splendid victory over a superior British force, which must rank your name high on the roll of naval conquerors, permit me to mention my son, Lieutenant Brooks, who fell on board the Lawrence during that memorable conflict. Not being acquainted with any individual in your fleet to whom I could apply for information respecting my son, I have taken the liberty of addressing myself for that purpose to you. Should you have a few moments at your command, it would be laying me under lasting obligation to inform me of the most prominent circumstances as to the time and manner of his fall. It would be also gratifying to me to know what disposition has been made of his effects, and whether his arms of different kinds have been disposed of or are retained. If the latter, it would be peculiarly grateful to me to be in possession of his best sword and sash; the former as a relic, the latter on account of its being the sash wore through the whole of the American Revolution. If compliance with this request should be proper and practicable, perhaps a safe conveyance to Boston may offer; otherwise I have to request they may be forwarded to my son, Alexander S. Brooks, who is a captain in the Third Regiment of Artillery, and is now stationed at Fort George.

"The citizens of Boston are taking measures to evince, in some measure, the sense they entertain of your distinguished merit; and, should you visit our capital, no one will greet you with more cordiality than, sir, your most obedient servant,

"John Brooks."

In this touching letter, worthy of the best days of the republic, the grief of a father for the loss of a favourite son, who was the admired and beloved of all beholders, gives way to the pride and exultation of the patriot. That other son of whom he speaks has since been numbered among the victims of the Florida war.

Captain Perry had lost no time in organizing the vessels of both squadrons still fit for active service for the transportation of the army under General Harrison to the opposite shore. On the fifteenth and sixteenth of September he had landed all his prisoners, with the exception of the sick and wounded, at Camp Portage, at the outlet of the river of that name in Sandusky Bay, whence they were to be marched to Chilicothe. A list of these prisoners by name, to the number of three hundred and eight, is in possession of the writer.

Having thus disposed of the sound portion of his prisoners, and hastily reorganized his combined squadron, Captain Perry placed the small vessels at the disposal of General Harrison, for the removal of his army from Portage River and Fort Meigs to Bass Island, preparatory to a descent upon Canada. He proceeded in person in the Ariel to Portage River, to receive General Harrison with his staff, and convey him to Putin Bay. A little incident which occurred on this passage, illustrative of the amiable feelings of Perry, and of his generous sympathy with the sick or suffering, is related by Major Chambers, of Kentucky, then one of General Harrison's aid-de-camps. About twenty or thirty soldiers, composing the remnant of a gallant company of young Virginians, who had joined the army the year before under the name of the Petersburg Volunteers, and who had been reduced by battle and disease to their present number, had accompanied General Harrison on board the Ariel.

On the passage to Put-in Bay, supper was served in the cabin, and, after the commodore and his numerous guests had partaken of it, they resumed their seats on deck to enjoy the evening air. Major Chambers was conversing with Lieutenant Packett, who commanded the Ariel, when one of the young Virginians, whom a spirit of adventure had led to abandon a life of ease for the hardships of the camp, and who was just recovering from severe illness, approached Major Chambers, whom he knew, and asked, in an under tone, if it would be possible for him to obtain a cup of coffee from the cabin, saying that his stomach rejected the cold and coarse food to which the army had necessarily been confined. Being a stranger to Perry, Major Chambers felt reluctant to trouble him with such a request, and therefore explained it to Mr. Packett. He hesitated to say anything, and the subject was dropped. But Perry, who was sitting near, had overheard the remark, and quietly given directions to his steward. In half an hour Major Chambers had the gratification of seeing the whole of the young Virginians seated round an excellent supper in the cabin, and the warm-hearted host attending to them in person. Perry had heard the character and gallantry of the little band assigned as the reason for taking them on board the Ariel, that they might be under the eye of the general, and kindly rebuked Major Chambers for having hesitated to explain what accident alone had revealed to him—the longing of these poor fellows for a cup of hot coffee.

"This little incident," says Major Chambers, "indicated to my satisfaction the character of the man and would alone have made a lasting impression; but it was not permitted to stand alone in the catalogue of proofs that he was as generous and kind as he was brave. I visited the cabin of the Detroit in his company, and witnessed the kindness of his manner and his generous solicitude for the comfort of his wounded prisoner, the gallant Captain Barclay. I subsequently accompanied him on board the Lawrence, on the morning she sailed with the wounded seamen for Erie; and I was inexpressibly gratified with the feeling he manifested towards the poor fellows, the anxiety he showed for their comfort, and the evident pleasure they derived from his attention to them. Many, very many little incidents occurred in the course of our brief intercourse to prove that my first impressions of his character were well-founded; his uniform kindness and sympathy towards every sufferer from disease, disaster, or other causes daily occurring in the army, was remarked by all who had the happiness of associating with him."

The army, amounting to four thousand five hundred men, was at length assembled at Bass Island, on the evening of the twenty-second. The size of the vessels prevented the embarkation of all the troops at once. In consequence, Captain Perry had suggested to General Harrison, before the battle with the British squadron—for a descent upon Canada had already been determined on, to take place so soon as Governor Shelby should arrive with the mass of the Kentucky militia—to rendezvous with the troops at the Middle Sister, an island distant twelve miles from Malden, and then take advantage of favourable weather to move the whole army simultaneously by means of the squadron and boats. This measure was now adopted; and, on the twenty-third, the operation of transporting the army to the Middle Sister was commenced, and, notwithstanding interruptions from bad weather, was successfully completed on the twenty-sixth. On that day, Captain Perry, accompanied by General Harrison, who had his headquarters on board the Ariel, reconnoitered the harbour of Malden and the adjacent shores. As the result of their investigation, the general fixed upon a point about three miles to the eastward of the town of Malden, or Amherstburg, as it is called by the English. The next day being appointed for landing, should the weather continue favourable, the general orders of debarkation, of march, and of battle were immediately drawn up under the direction of the general, signed by Colonel E. P. Gaines, the adjutant-general, on board the Ariel, and made known to the army on her return to the Middle Sister, together with the following brief words of encouragement and humane caution: "The general entreats his brave troops to remember that they are the sons of sires whose fame is immortal; that they are to fight for the rights of their insulted country, while their opponents combat for the unjust pretensions of a master. Kentuckians! remember the River Raisin! but remember it only while the victory is suspended. The revenge of a soldier cannot be gratified upon a fallen enemy!"

At three o'clock on the morning of the twenty-seventh, the weather proving mild, the army was all embarked into the boats or taken on board the squadron. This service being effected at nine o'clock, the squadron weighed, and stood towards the designated point of debarkation. At two o'clock the vessels anchored in line of battle, about a mile and a half to the eastward of Bar Point, and at the distance of a quarter of a mile from the shore, with springs on their cables, in readiness to cover the debarkation of the troops. At forty-five minutes after two, all that could be contained in the boats were landed on the beach simultaneously, and in admirable order. There was no enemy to oppose them. Information was soon obtained, and communicated to Captain Perry, that the enemy had evacuated Malden, and retired in the direction of Sandwich, up the left bank of the Detroit. The squadron immediately weighed, stood into the harbour, and anchored off the town, where the rest of the troops were landed at five o'clock, soon after the main body had marched in. On taking possession of the town, it was discovered that the enemy had destroyed the fort, barracks, navy yard, and public stores.

The evacuation of Amherstburg by General Proctor may have been rendered inevitable by the want of provisions to stand a siege. He had at his disposal three thousand Indians, which, with seven hundred regular troops and the militia of the district, made him nearly equal in numbers to our army. He had, moreover, the advantage of position. The Indians were exceedingly anxious to fight, and two thirds of them abandoned his army when he commenced his retreat. The brave and eloquent Tecumseh, with about a thousand followers, though strongly opposed to retreating, the impolicy and disgrace of which he powerfully set forth, still remained. In the harangue in which he attempted to dissuade the British general from his inglorious, and, as it proved, disastrous determination, he certainly took some very extraordinary and undutiful liberties. "Listen, Father!" said he; "our fleet has gone out.

We know they have fought; we have heard the great guns, but know nothing of what has happened to our Father with one arm. Our fleet has gone one way, and we are very much astonished to see our Father tying up everything, and preparing to run away the other, without letting his red children know what his intentions are. You always told us that you would never draw your foot off British ground; but now, Father, we see that you are drawing back, and we are sorry to see our Father doing so without seeing the enemy. We must compare our Father's conduct to a fat animal that carries its tail upon its back, but, when affrighted, it drops it between its legs and runs off. We wish to remain here and fight the enemy, should he appear. If he conquers us, we will then retreat with our Father."

No time was lost in following the retreating enemy. Our army marched up the left bank of the Detroit, while the squadron sailed up the river, transporting the heavy baggage and provisions of the troops. The army took possession of Sandwich on the twenty-ninth. Here General Harrison learned from deserters that the British army, consisting of seven hundred regular troops and a thousand Indians, had taken post on the right bank of the river Thames, at Dalson's, about fifty-six miles from Sandwich. It was stated that General Proctor intended to fortify himself in that position, and await an attack. If defeated, he could continue his retreat up the banks of the Thames, in the direction of Lake Ontario, near which it has its source. At Sandwich, deputations were received from the Ottawas, Chippewas, Wyandots, Miamis, and a band of hostile Delawares, all of which had abandoned the enemy's army, and now offered to make peace and co-operate against their former friends.

On the same day General Harrison embarked with General M'Arthur's brigade, seven hundred strong, in the squadron, and proceeded with Captain Perry to take possession of Detroit. There were about a thousand Indians lurking in the neighbourhood of the town, but they fled without resistance on the approach of the squadron. Soon after, they gave in their submission to General M'Arthur, and agreed to "take hold of the same tomahawk, and strike all who were the enemies of the United States, whether British or Indians." General Harrison now issued a proclamation, announcing the expulsion of the enemy from Michigan, and re-establishing the civil government as it existed before the subjugation of the territory. This being completed, he returned to Sandwich in the Ariel. In the mean time, the mounted Kentuckians of Colonel Johnson's regiment had reached Detroit and crossed to Sandwich, and, with them, the horses belonging to the staff and field officers of the army.

On the thirtieth of September, having received information that some small vessels of the enemy were escaping up Lake St. Clair, towards the Thames, with the baggage and artillery of Proctor's army, Captain Perry despatched Captain Elliott with the Niagara, Lady Prevost, now commanded by Lieutenant Turner, Scorpion, and Tigress up the Detroit into Lake St. Clair, to pursue them. He soon after followed with the Ariel and Caledonia, the latter now commanded by Lieutenant Holdup Stevens. On the second of October he appeared off the mouth of the Thames, where he joined the vessels which he had detached in pursuit of the enemy's baggage; they had been unable to overtake the escaping vessels before they entered the river.

On the morning of the third of October, our army having reached the neighbourhood of the Thames to the number of thirty-five hundred men, General Cass's brigade having been left at Sandwich, though he himself accompanied the commander-in-chief in the character of aid-de-camp, Captain Perry now ordered Captain Elliott, with the Scorpion, Tigress, and Porcupine, to enter the river, they being the only vessels that could cross the bar at its mouth, and proceed up it with a large number of boats conveying the baggage of the army. The schooners held themselves in readiness to protect the passage of the army over the Thames or its tributaries, should opposition be offered. There were four streams crossing the route of the army in its pursuit of the enemy, which were deep and muddy, and not fordable except at points remote from their outlets into the Thames. All of these had bridges over them. Through the great neglect of the enemy, the bridge over the first stream, which the army reached on the night of the second of October, was found entire. On the morning of the third, the general, having pushed forward at the head of Colonel R. M. Johnson's regiment of mounted Kentuckians, fortunately captured a lieutenant of dragoons and eleven privates belonging to the enemy, who were engaged in destroying the second bridge. From the prisoners the general learned that the enemy had no certain information of his advance. The third bridge, having only been partially destroyed, probably to leave a passage for the dragoons who were to complete its destruction, when over, was repaired by our army, which passed over and encamped four miles below Dalson's, at which point it had been supposed the enemy would have been found intrenched and disposed to offer battle.

In this neighbourhood the river Thames assumed a different character. Its channel grew narrow, with a more rapid current, and the banks steep, lofty, and wooded, so as to expose the decks of the vessels to the Indian sharp-shooters, while their artillery would be of no service should they attempt to accompany the army farther. The general agreed, on consultation with Captain Perry, that it would be inexpedient to carry the vessels higher, and that they should be left, with the boats and heavy baggage, at this point, with a guard of infantry to assist in their protection.

By this time Perry had become so excited with the pursuit that he could not consent to remain inactive with his vessels; leaving them, therefore, in charge of Captain Elliott, he tendered his services to General Harrison as an aid-de-camp. They were gladly accepted; and, by the kindness of a brother volunteer aid, Major John Chambers, who dismounted his servant in order to be able to offer him a horse, he was mounted, and ready to set forward with the army. The volunteers from the army who had served in the squadron, and passed alive and unwounded through the action of the tenth of September, had long since returned to the ranks, and spread among their comrades the most glowing accounts of Perry's heroism and humanity. Most of the soldiers, too, had seen something of him for themselves in the course of the various transportations of the army to Put-in Bay, the Middle Sister, and to Malden. He had been able, by his conciliatory treatment, to do away with the prevailing idea of a constitutional dislike between the sailors and soldiers, and to keep them in a good humour with each other, notwithstanding their crowded condition while on board the vessels, being often so close together that they were unable to sit down. To his exertions and those of the general it was owing that such perfect harmony existed between the two corps. On this account, and owing to the admiration excited by Perry's recent victory, aided by his commanding person and the grace of his horsemanship, which was a subject of universal remark, he was rapturously received throughout the army, and followed by animating cheers.

On the march Perry found abundant amusement in the odd ways and sayings of the Kentucky militia. The exercise and rapid motion, after a confinement of some weeks on shipboard, oppressed with responsibility and anxious cares, exhilarated him greatly. He entered with sportsmanlike zeal into the excitement of the rapid pursuit, and of the hourly increasing evidences that it would result in overtaking the enemy, and compelling him to fight or surrender; boats were taken and their crews made prisoners, and the hostile Indians made frequent efforts to check the advance of our troops, skirmishing with the videttes, and picking off our men across the river. A volley thus fired on one of our advanced parties attracted the attention of Perry and Major Chambers, who rode at speed in the direction of the report, to see what it might be. A party of Indians had fired at one of our advanced guards, and, being concealed in the high grass, our men did not return the fire, but drew off from the bank of the river to avoid it. Having reached the point immediately opposite where the savages were lurking, Perry suddenly reined up, and exclaimed to his companion, "See that sneaking rascal crawling in the grass over there!" pointing, at the same time, to an Indian who was in the act of taking shelter behind a tree, from which he could fire securely. At this moment a large Indian of the Shawnee tribe, in our service, and known as "Big Anderson," who had concealed himself below the river bank to get a shot, rose up suddenly, and, waving his hand authoritatively, cried out, "Go way, fool! he shoot." Perry and his companion took the courteous hint and rode off with whole skins, laughing heartily.

A march of eight miles from the encampment of the previous night brought the army to Chatham, where another tributary of the Thames was to be crossed. The bridge here was effectually destroyed, and a party of several hundred Indians were drawn up on the opposite bank to dispute the passage of our troops. General Harrison, believing the whole British force to be at hand, drew up his army in order of battle, and brought up his artillery to cover the party detailed to repair the bridge. The Indians, for it proved to be only a skirmishing party, soon after fell back, and our army passed over. Near the bridge, a house, stored with arms, was found in flames, which were fortunately extinguished. Farther on, a vessel, loaded with arms and ammunition, was found on fire. Four miles beyond, two other vessels were found on fire; also a large distillery, filled with a large amount of ordnance and other valuable stores. The flames had proceeded too far to save them. Two twenty-four pounders, with their carriages, were, however, found, and a large quantity of shot and shells. Information was here obtained that the enemy were still on the right bank of the river, and only a few miles ahead. It was therefore probable that they would be overtaken and brought to action on the following day. The army halted for the night, the picquets were stationed, and soldiers and officers bivouacked together in the field, under the canopy of heaven, for there were no tents. Perry and his friend Major Chambers, after making such a meal as the providence of the servant of the latter had reserved, shared the same bed of prairie grass, with their horses picqueted near them, in readiness to mount at a moment's warning.

The pursuit was renewed at an early hour on the morning of the fifth. The march now lay through a fine agricultural country, dotted with frequent and well-cultivated farms, surrounded by abundant orchards, of which the fruit was then ripe. The peaceful inhabitants, harassed and terrified by the passage of two armies, had abandoned their dwellings. The general took care that, at any rate, they should not suffer from their enemies, and rigorously forbade the slightest depredations. In a short time after the renewal of the march, two gunboats and a number of bateaux, ascending the river with provisions and military stores, were overtaken and captured. At nine o'clock the army reached Arnold's Mills, at which point was the only ford within some distance at which the army could be conveniently crossed, so as to reach the right bank up which the enemy was retreating. Even here the water was too deep for the infantry to wade without great inconvenience. The mounted men hesitated to take the footmen behind them on their tired horses, and they were about to be left to wade or get over as they could, in a few canoes and bateaux which had been captured in the neighbourhood, when, as is stated by Major Chambers, Perry rode into the crowd at the ford, and, ordering a footman to jump up behind him, dashed into the stream, calling to the mounted men to take up the footmen and follow him. Some of the officers of the staff who were near Perry immediately imitated his example; and, in a very short time, the whole army was on the opposite shore, in a condition to pursue its march, without the inconvenience to the foot soldiers of wet clothing.

Eight miles above the ford the army passed a farm where part of the British troops had bivouacked on the previous night. From one of the enemy's wagoners overtaken at this point, information was obtained that General Proctor had passed the previous night at the Moravian town, an Indian village under the patronage of the Moravians, about four miles farther up the Thames. It was also ascertained that Proctor, being now unable to escape without fighting, had halted his army a mile and a half in front of the Moravian town, and disposed it in order of battle. In fact, Colonel R. M. Johnson, who rode in the van at the head of his mounted Kentuckians, soon after sent word to General Harrison that his progress was arrested by the enemy's army formed across our line of march. The general now drew up his troops in order of battle. The ground occupied by the enemy, and the whole space over which the road passed for nearly four miles below him, consisted of a narrow strip of land from two to three hundred yards wide, having the river on one side and an impenetrable morass on the other. It was covered throughout with a heavy growth of timber, chiefly beechwood, but was almost entirely free from underbrush. Across this narrow neck of land Proctor had drawn up his army, to the number of about seventeen hundred men, having his right in the morass, covered by the whole body of his Indians, under Tecumseh, amounting to a thousand warriors, and his left on the river, supported by six pieces of artillery. The position thus taken by General Proctor manifested great judgment, inasmuch as the morass on one flank, and the river on the other, effectually prevented them from being turned; while our army, though more numerous, could only oppose a line of equal extent. In fact, though the number of our troops in the field amounted to more than three thousand, only one hundred and twenty of which were regulars, our number actually engaged, on account of the want of space to form them, scarcely exceeded that of the enemy.

acting adjutant Captain Butler, by General Cass, who had volunteered his services as an aid, and by Perry. It had been intended that the mounted riflemen from Kentucky should meet the Indians, with whom they were accustomed to fight in their own peculiar manner, and upon whom they were desirous to revenge the massacre of so many of their brothers and relations at the Miami and the Raisin. The thickness of the wood and the swampiness of the ground on the enemy's right, where lay the morass, would have rendered a body of horse unserviceable in that quarter, and subjected it to certain destruction. There was no time to dismount it, and, in the emergency of the moment, the general hastily conceived the idea of a sudden charge of this mounted corps upon the British centre, composed of infantry. Long familiarity with our western backwoodsmen had made General Harrison aware of the dexterity with which they ride through the forests in pursuit of game, without being in the least incommoded by their rifles. He reasoned, too, as it subsequently appeared judiciously, that the enemy would be unprepared for so novel a charge. He immediately ordered the advance of the whole army; the centre and right were to break through the enemy's line, if possible, and overpower them at once; while the left was to await the attack of the Indians, when in contact with them. The army was put in motion, and Colonel Johnson charged at the head of his mounted Kentuckians in gallant style. At the first fire received from the enemy's line, the horses in front took fright and recoiled; a second volley was poured in by the enemy, when, getting in motion, the mounted men broke through the opposite line, and in a moment decided the contest, dispersing the enemy, bearing down all resistance, and compelling him to surrender. At the same moment, the small party of regulars advancing on the right, and some friendly Indians coming up under cover of the bank of the river, got possession of the enemy's artillery. Meantime, the hostile Indians on the left maintained the contest from the morass, and under cover of the trees, in a more obstinate manner. For a moment they made an impression on our front line of infantry; when Governor Shelby, who commanded at that point, and who, as General Harrison wrote, "at the age of sixty-six preserved all the vigour of youth, the ardent zeal which distinguished him in the revolutionary war, and the undaunted bravery which he manifested at King's Mountain," brought up a regiment which checked the onset of the Indians. Colonel Johnson, too, having now borne down all opposition in front, wheeled with a part of his regiment, and, gaining the rear of the Indians, caused them to retreat with great slaughter. In the course of this last onset Colonel Johnson came personally in contact with Tecumseh. Both the white and the Indian warriors were already bleeding from many wounds received earlier in the battle. Colonel Johnson, whose heroism had carried him wherever the danger was most imminent, had already received no fewer than five wounds. Tecumseh was in the act of launching his tomahawk with deadly aim at Colonel Johnson, when the latter, quicker in his movements or better seconded by his weapon, brought him to the ground with a pistolshot. Resistance was now at an end, and with it ceased the effusion of blood. There was no deliberate murder and scalping by our friendly Indians; and the heroic Kentuckians, who had been stigmatized by the British as worse than savages, and many of whom mourned a relation or a friend cut off in cold blood at the Miami or the Raisin, responded nobly to the merciful caution of the general, "The revenge of a soldier cannot be gratified on a fallen enemy."

The fruits of this victory were complete. While our loss in killed and wounded amounted to but twenty-nine, that of the enemy was ascertained to be at least thirty-four British, in addition to thirty-three Indians found dead on the field of battle. Six hundred and twenty-six regular troops, including soldiers and officers, were made prisoners. Proctor, accompanied by forty dragoons and a few mounted Indians, escaped the hot pursuit which was kept up for him, by the superior speed of his horses. An immense amount of military stores was either taken or destroyed by the enemy in his retreat. Among the most valuable of the spoils was a train of his brass cannons, three of which were revolutionary trophies, taken at Yorktown and Saratoga, and surrendered by General Hull at Detroit. Among the more precious fruits of the victory were the separation of the savage allies of England from her cause, and the relief of our frontier from the horrors by which it had been so long desolated.

Captain Perry acted an important part during the battle as aid to the general. In his official report, General Harrison took occasion to state that his "gallant friend, Commodore Perry," had accompanied him at the head of his army, and assisted him in forming his line of battle; "the appearance of the brave commodore," added he, "cheered and animated every breast." Perry's was not merely an honorary office during the battle, but he strove to make it an active one; and his services were freely used by the general. A little incident, illustrative of his activity as an aiddecamp, and of his extraordinary skill as a horseman, is mentioned by Major Chambers. This gentleman states that, from the moment he joined the army, his splendid horsemanship had attracted great attention. He rode a powerful and spirited black horse with a white face, which served to distinguish the rider as far as he could be seen. The horse became very much excited in the battle, and on one occasion, when Perry had been despatched with an order from the general, and was passing from the right of the front line to the left wing of the army, he plunged into one of the deep sloughs which abounded in the direction of the swamp, and sank nearly to the breast. In an instant Perry pressed his hands on the pommel of the saddle, and sprang over the horse's head to the dry ground. Relieved from the weight of his rider, the horse instantly extricated himself by a powerful effort, and, snorting as he trod the solid ground again, bounded forward at the speed he had held before the accident. Perry clutched the animal's mane as he released himself from the marsh, and vaulted into the saddle without in the slightest degree checking the speed of the beast, or touching bridle or stirrup until he was fairly seated. Major Chambers, who witnessed this feat, was astonished and pleased at it; and the Kentuckians, who were approaching the enemy at a charging pace, cheered the brave sailor as he passed them.

The private misery which attended the battle of the Thames, as that of Lake Erie, and doubtless all other battles whether by sea or land, gave scope again for the indulgence of those benevolent and humane feelings which were ever uppermost in the breast of Perry. The Moravian town was a settlement of Christianized Indians, under the patronage of the missionaries of the excellent and benevolent Moravian sect. During the occupation of the village by our army, Perry was able to render essential services to the missionaries. Of the nature of these services we have no other means of judging than by the following interesting letter, found among his correspondence. It is dated at Bethlehem, and signed by Mr. John G. Cunow, on behalf of the missionaries.

"Honoured And Dear Sir,

"The directors of the Society of the United Brethren, commonly called Moravians, residing at this place, have been informed by the Reverend Mr. Schnall, late one of our missionaries in Upper Canada, of the friendly offices and generous protection which you had the goodness to afford to our missionaries when the settlement of our Christian Indians on Thames River was taken possession of by the army of the United States under General Harrison.

"Impressed with the most lively sense of gratitude for the numerous proofs of your benevolent disposition towards our missionaries when in distress and danger, the directors beg leave to present to you their sincerest and most cordial acknowledgments. May the Lord, whose servants you have taken pleasure to protect, be your shield and your exceeding great reward, have you in his holy keeping, and bless you in life, death, and throughout eternity."

We are indebted for the following additional anecdote of Perry's amiable anxiety to allay the calamities of war, to the accidental discovery by Mr. Chambers of a good deed which was meant only for the eye of the All-seeing. From the official letter of General Harrison, it appears that this gentleman went in pursuit of General Proctor with a small party of officers and mounted riflemen amounting only to seven. During the pursuit, General Harrison states that they made many prisoners. They also overtook a large straggling party of women and children, composing the families of the soldiers of the Forty-first Regiment, which had long been stationed at Fort Malden. These had followed the army in its retreat up the Detroit and Thames, and had remained at the Moravian town within hearing of the battle. On seeing the general escaping at speed through the village with a handful of followers, they too fled in great alarm. At the head of this woe-worn group, who rent the air with sobs and lamentations as they struggled onward, was an interesting and modest young woman, with a pair of twin babies, one of which she carried on each hip. Mr. Chambers checked his horse, and reassured the affrighted women, telling them they had nothing to fear either from the Americans or their friendly Indians; and succeeded in prevailing upon them to return to the village. He ordered a half-breed squaw, who was among the fugitives, to carry one of the twins of the young woman, and then turned to continue the pursuit with his comrades.<sup>5</sup>

On the following morning, Major Chambers having duty at the Moravian town, Perry offered to accompany him. On reaching the town, the first object that attracted his attention was the woman with twins standing in the doorway of one of the deserted Indian cabins. After some conversation with the woman, and some words of encouragement as to the fate of her husband, and having requested her to remain where she was until his return, Chambers related to Perry the circumstances under which he had found her the day before, struggling to save her little ones from the apprehended danger of being butchered by the American Indians, or, as she thought, more savage Kentuckians. The two aid-de-camps separated in the village. When Major Chambers had despatched the business on which he had been sent, he went to look for the woman and the twins, in order to make some benevolent provision for their comfort. But they were no longer in the cabin. On his return towards the camp, he found them in a cart driven by a Canadian Frenchman. Upon accosting the woman, she at once told him that his companion had hired the man to take her home to Amherstburg, a distance of more than a hundred miles. "May God bless and prosper him," said she; "he is the kindest and most generous gentleman in the world, and has been an angel of mercy to me and my poor babes. See," said she, extending her hand, "he has not only paid this man to take us home, but has given me all this money to buy clothes for these dear little ones, now that their poor father is a prisoner and going to be sent away into the States." Mr. Chambers represents her gratitude at such unexpected benevolence from an enemy as affecting her even to tears. In order that she might know to whom she was indebted, he mentioned to her that the gentleman who had befriended her was the American Commodore Perry; and she seemed to wonder the more that the character which recent events had led her to associate with ideas only of terror, should have appeared to her in such an aspect of gentleness and mercy.

While Perry was thus assisting to consummate on the land the triumph which he had so gloriously begun afloat, and delivering himself up, after victory, to the indulgence of his overflowing benevolence, the heart of Captain Elliott was a prey to envy and rancorous hatred of his magnanimous commander. We have seen that on the fourth of October, the day preceding the battle of the Thames, by agreement between General Harrison and Perry, the three gunboats, Scorpion, Tigress, and Porcupine, had been left with the boats containing the baggage and a guard of infantry, to await the farther movements of the army, at a point where the river, becoming narrower, and the banks steep and thickly wooded, rendered the advance of the vessels perilous by exposing their decks to the fire of the enemy, and preventing them from the use of their artillery. Captain Elliott had been left in command of these vessels. Instead, however, of remaining at the post assigned him, fulfilling its duties, whether important or unimportant, like a faithful officer, he continued to follow the army up the river, and, in fact, ascended to within three miles of the battle-ground, where he took possession of the vessels laden with valuable stores, which had been captured shortly before by the army. Captain Elliott thereby not only committed the great military fault of disobeying the orders of his superior, without the occurrence of any circumstance not contemplated by that superior, or other assignable motive than caprice and waywardness, but he exposed his own vessels to destruction without the means of resistance, the baggage to possible capture from a marauding band of Indians, and, in case of the defeat of the army, broke up those precautionary measures of the commanding general and commodore, by which the retiring army would have found, at a given point, a force stationed to cover its retreat, and the means of re-embarkation. While engaged in this act of disobedience, the mind of Captain Elliott was possessed by notions of fancied wrongs from Perry, thus far studiously concealed from the latter, disappointed hopes for fame, and venomous efforts to disparage the too generous chief who had rescued him from reprobation. During this cruise up the Thames, Captain Elliott lived on board the Scorpion, commanded by sailing-master, now commander, Stephen Champlin. from whom the foregoing information with regard to the removal of the vessels from the point where they were ordered to remain has been received. To this officer he commenced the wonted story of his complaints, coupled with abuse of Perry, and commendations of himself as the hero of the day.*** Still, in this very conversation, he stated that "in the action he was so far from the enemy that he only fired his twelve-pounders during two hours and a half." The reason he assigned was, that "he had no signal from the commodore to change his situation."<sup>7</sup> He stated that "the officers and men of the Lawrence, including Commodore Perry, were by no means entitled to prize-money;" and still farther, that "the other officers and men of the squadron were even entitled to prize-money for her, she being a recaptured vessel." Scorning this vain attempt to appeal to his cupidity and tamper with his loyalty, coming, as it did, from an officer so much his superior in rank, and having for its object to depreciate the fair and well-earned fame of their common commander, Mr. Champlin indignantly rejected the idea of disparaging the momentous share which the Lawrence had in the victory, because, through her abandonment by the Niagara, she had been compelled temporarily to strike her colours. Mr. Champlin replied with some warmth, that he knew not who was entitled to prize-money for the victory if the commodore was not. For himself, he would scorn to receive a cent if Commodore Perry was not a sharer. Irritated by this manly opposition, Captain Elliott gave way to extreme irritation, and unwarily expressed a sentiment which may serve as a clue to the mystery of his whole conduct during the battle. After complaining of the commodore's injustice to him in his account of the battle, he told Mr. Champlin that "he only regretted that he had not sacrificed the fleet when it was in his power to have done so."

Thus at one time we find Captain Elliott complaining to Mr. Champlin "that in the action he was so far from the enemy that he only fired his twelve-pounders during two hours and a half," and assigning as a reason for this "that he had no signal from the commodore to change his station," when the commodore had assigned him a station alongside the Queen Charlotte, told him that his object was close action, and shown him the way into it with the Lawrence, at another, claiming credit for having altered the order of battle on his own responsibility, and justifying himself on the grounds of his "being the second in command, the only captain in the squadron except Commodore Perry, and commanding a ship of equal force with the flag-ship," and therefore "the only officer that would venture upon such an expedient."<sup>8</sup> These opinions may aid in explaining Captain Elliott's motives of action in his connexion with Perry. Happily, they are such opinions as are not likely to find favour in the navy. Few right-minded officers will deny, that the fact of Captain Elliott's being the second in command, instead of conferring immunity for disobedience, imposed the duty of being first to set an example of subordination.

ON the seventh of October Perry returned to Detroit, to which place the army soon after followed, all armed resistance having ceased. General Harrison and Captain Perry now issued a joint proclamation, dated at Sandwich, to the inhabitants of the upper district of Upper Canada, informing them that the land and naval forces of the British having been captured or destroyed, and the district being now in quiet possession of our troops, it became necessary to provide for its civil government. The inhabitants were therefore guaranteed protection in their persons and property, and all their previous rights and privileges were secured to them. The laws and customs of the country, as they existed previous to its conquest, were declared to be in force, and the magistrates and civil officers were directed to resume their functions, having previously taken an oath of fidelity to the government of the United States as long as the district should remain in our possession.

There being no longer any armed enemy on our northwestern frontier or in the neighbourhood of the upper lakes, it became obvious that the greater portion of the militia would be disbanded, and the remainder of the army transported to Buffalo, to be in a situation to act on the Niagara frontier. The business of completely vanquishing the enemy had been so quickly despatched, that some delay at Detroit was necessary in order to learn the pleasure of the government as to the disposition to be made of the fleet and army. The leisure was employed in completing the pacification of the Indian tribes, who had already been admitted by General M'Arthur to terms of peace, and had given hostages for their good behavior. The fate of the great chief Tecumseh, at the Thames, had effectually broken the league, of which he had been the master-spirit.

During this detention at Detroit, Perry enjoyed the first-fruits of that glory which his splendid victory had won for him. It was there that newspapers, pouring in from every side, made him first aware of the vast importance that was attached to what he had achieved, in its effects at once on the interests as well as the glory of the nation. He was everywhere hailed as the deliverer of the frontier from savage warfare, as the first American victor in a general naval action with a powerful foe, for centuries accustomed only to conquer; and the peculiar circumstances of personal gallantry which attended his own conduct in retieving the day, when, to all appearances, so nearly lost, and which rendered the victory so eminently his own, had fastened itself upon the popular imagination, and created a fervour of enthusiasm in his behalf, which sped with electric rapidity over the whole country, uniting all parties, whether opposed to or in favour of the war, in one fervent glow of admiration. Salutes and illuminations everywhere greeted the arrival of the intelligence, and the general joy is said to have been unequalled since the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown.

The congratulations of Perry's own family were not among the least acceptable that he received. One incident sensibly touched his feelings. The news of his victory had found his grandfather, Freeman Perry, at the mature age of eighty-three, on his deathbed. The first brief announcement of the victory, in the moment of its being won, was read to him. On the verge of the grave, he could yet exult in the achievement of his descendant, by which so much was done for the cause of humanity as well as of his own country. But the pious reliance on a superior power, instead of on his own might, evinced in the few lines of his grandson's despatch, gratified him even to tears. He caused it to be read over to him several times; and the words " it has pleased the Almighty " lingered on his lips, and blended with his latest prayers for the prosperity of his children.

The secretary of the navy, whose censorious letter of the eighteenth of August was still fresh in Perry's memory, was not the last to give way to the prevailing sentiment, or to acknowledge the brilliancy of a victory which had lustre to spare to reflect a little on himself. The following letter, coming, as it does, in the collection of Perry's letters from the navy department next to that of the eighteenth of August, is absolutely amusing in its contrast. Its somewhat turgid style too, compares disadvantageously with the solemn yet modest terms in which Perry had addressed him.

Navy Department, September 21, 1813.

"Sir,

"Rumour had preceded and prepared the public mind for the enthusiastic reception of the glorious tidings confirmed by your letter of the tenth, received and published in handbills this day.

"Every demonstration of joy and admiration that a victory so transcendantly brilliant, decisive, and important in its consequences could excite, was exhibited as far and as fast as the roar of cannon and the splendour of illumination could travel.

"In the absence of the president, I have no hesitation in anticipating his warmest admiration and thanks, in behalf of our country, for this splendid achievement, which must ever continue among the brightest honours of the nation. You will please accept for yourself an ample share, and communicate to the gallant officers, seamen, and others under your command, the full measure of those sentiments and feelings which it is my duty to express and my delight to cherish.

"To-morrow, I trust, will bring the interesting details, for which so many hearts are palpitating, between the laurel and the cypress.

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"W. Jones."

"Oliver H. Perry, Esq.,

"Commanding the U. S. naval forces on Lake Erie."

Accompanying this letter from the secretary, another, dated on the subsequent day, was at the same time received from him, approving of Perry's disposition of the prizes, and expressing the hope that the commissary-general of prisoners would approve his promise to admit Commodore Barclay to parole, and his desire to extend to the wounded prisoners generally every office of humanity consistent with their safe keeping. He at the same time received from the commissary-general of prisoners the requested authority to parole Barclay, for which he expressed his gratitude in terms which show how strong an interest he took in befriending his gallant prisoner. Soon after, Perry received a third letter from the secretary, communicating the president's approbation of his heroic conduct in the action of the tenth of September, the better to express which, the president had directed a commission to be made out, promoting him to the rank of post-captain; and, to render the compliment more appropriate, he was made to take rank from the day of his victory. Perry was within one of being at the head of the list of masters-commandant, and the reward, in his case, was insignificant when compared with that which had been bestowed on Lieutenant C. Morris for services which, from his subordinate situation, were necessarily inferior to those which Perry had been able to render. Yet, having nobly acquiesced in the advancement of Lieutenant Morris over his head, and, in fact, over the whole grade of masters-commandant, he scrupled, in his own case, to receive promotion over a single officer, and expressed to the secretary, in reply, his wish that, if there should be any doubts as to the propriety of his promotion, his commission might be kept back until he should be entitled to it by seniority, without passing over Captain Leonard, the only officer of his grade above him.

The letter which announced Perry's promotion also granted him leave which he had requested to return to his family, provided he was of the opinion that the service would not suffer by his absence. In that event, he was directed to resume the command of the Newport station until a suitable ship should be provided for him. No service of importance remaining for him to perform on the upper lakes, in consequence of the total overthrow of British power in that quarter, he prepared to avail himself of the leave thus given to him, and to gratify his longing desire to be reunited to his family. General Harrison had received orders to repair with a part of his army to Fort George. Two thousand of the troops were therefore embarked on board the squadron, and General Harrison, with part of his staff, took passage with Perry in the Ariel. Touching at Put-in Bay, Perry had the lively gratification of announcing to Commodore Barclay that he was empowered to parole him, and of receiving him, with his surgeon, on board of the Ariel, in order to transport him as far as Buffalo on his way homeward. The remainder of the British prisoners remained on board the Detroit and Queen Charlotte, in Put-in Bay, a few days longer. They were then embarked for Erie, where they were carefully attended until completely cured; after which they were removed to Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania, for their greater security from desertion.

On the twenty-second of October the Ariel arrived alone at Erie, the rest of the squadron not getting in until the close of the day. Perry immediately landed, accompanied by General Harrison; and he, with the general's adjutant-general, Colonel Gaines, assisted in sustaining Commodore Barclay up the steep hill to the hotel where they were to lodge. The citizens, recognizing the Ariel in the offing, had speedily prepared to receive Perry with the enthusiasm which his victory awakened among them. They had witnessed his anxious and apparently hopeless efforts to create the squadron, obstructed by every conceivable difficulty, and in perpetual peril of its being destroyed by the enemy while yet incomplete. His steady perseverance and resources, equal to every emergency as it occurred, had at length enabled him to launch forth upon the lake, and win a victory over the superior force which had been so long in possession of it. And now he was returned among them, after having triumphed eminently by his own unparalleled exertions and heroism, afloat, and having prepared and assisted in the triumph which had ensued upon land. They, more than others of their fellow-citizens, were aware of the magnitude of Perry's services and the difficulties by which he was surrounded. They received him again among them with a salute of guns, and the whole population of the village, meeting him at the beach with exulting and enthusiastic acclamations, accompanied him in triumphant procession.

Perry had expected that the unattended manner in which he had arrived in the little Ariel would have allowed him to reach his lodgings unperceived with his wounded friend, to whom quiet was so necessary, and to whom a turmoil of this nature must have been particularly painful, by reminding him of the triumph which he had hoped would have been his own. The generous nature of Perry would have shrunk from exposing Barclay to so painful a position had it been anticipated. It only remained for him to provide in the best manner that he was able for his comfort during their short stay in Erie.

In the course of the afternoon the Niagara arrived in the offing, whence Captain Elliott reported himself by letter. He stated that he was so much indisposed that he deemed it necessary to go on shore to sickquarters, and, in a friendly note at the bottom of his official letter, requested Perry to procure a room for him. It may thus be perceived that he still ostensibly preserved a friendly bearing towards Perry, though habitually assailing him in his conversations with others. That evening the whole village of Erie was in a blaze of illumination, and the inhabitants paraded the streets with transparencies descriptive of the battles by sea and land, and laudatory of the chiefs by whom they had been gained. The names of Perry and Harrison were everywhere emblazoned with the Tenth of September and the Fifth of October, the dates on which they had been gained, and the memorable words, "We have met the enemy and they are ours." The name of Captain Elliott figured on no transparency, nor was he in any way noticed by the citizens collected to do honour to the two chiefs. Finding himself wholly neglected by this assemblage, and that his sayings formed no watchwords, his name called forth no exulting cheers, and observing in the newspapers that the credit of the victory, which had awakened such enthusiasm throughout the country, was ascribed wholly to Perry, he became a prey to discontent and rancorous feelings towards the individual by whose deeds, even more than his superior station, he had been thrown into such obscurity. Captain Elliott now addressed to General Harrison the complaints and the self-eulogy that he had heretofore confined to humbler listeners. He stated that Commodore Perry had done him injustice in his official despatch, by leading the public to believe that, during several hours of the fight, he had not been in close action, whereas he asserted to General Harrison he had been so during the whole time, and that his officers were ready to prove it; that Commodore Perry had promised, after showing him a rough draught of his report, to alter the part to which he objected; but, having failed to do so, the public were misled; and that, instead of obtaining credit for one half of the victory, which he claimed as his due, he had been calumniated by unfavourable rumours, which Commodore Perry had done nothing to counteract.

An ancient friendship which had existed between the father of Captain Elliott and General Harrison, and which had doubtless influenced Captain Elliott's application, induced General Harrison, at Captain Elliott's request, to state to Commodore Perry the substance of his complaint with regard to the position assigned to his ship in the official report of the battle. Under the friendly auspices of General Harrison, an interview took place on the following morning between Commodore Perry and Captain Elliott, in which the former, while insisting upon the conformity of his report, which he had only conditionally promised to alter, with his own distinct impressions, generously consented to an arbitration between two officers, one of which was to be chosen by Captain Elliott. If they should decide that the report did injustice to Captain Elliott, Perry promised to write a letter to the secretary of the navy correcting whatever they should consider erroneous; and this letter was to be published for the exculpation of Captain Elliott.

Lieutenant D. Turner, who commanded the Caledonia during the action, and Lieutenant J. J. Edwards, of the Niagara, who had been her second lieutenant during the action, and, by the illness and departure of Lieutenant Smith, had since become first, were the officers respectively chosen. These having taken into consideration that part of the official report relating to the period at which the Niagara came into close action, namely, at half past two, of which Captain Elliott complained, were unanimously of opinion, which they expressed before General Harrison, who was present throughout, that the report was correct. Perry, in consequence, announced to Captain Elliott by letter, from Buffalo, that he must decline making any alteration in his official report.<sup>1</sup>

Before we accompany Perry in his triumphal progress towards his native state, we will anticipate events, in order to review the subsequent efforts of Captain Elliott, when left in command on Lake Erie, to undermine the reputation of his late commander, and repair and magnify his own. Shortly after the tenth of September, while the army was encamped on Bass Island, and the officers were, of course always happy to exchange the extreme discomforts of their tents for a lodging on shipboard, Major Chambers went on board the Niagara, by invitation from Captain Elliott, to pass the night. Very soon after entering the cabin, his host began relating the events of the battle in such a way as to show that he considered himself unjustly treated by the commodore, and entitled to more credit than he was likely to receive. At this time, nothing, of course, could have been generally known of the official report of Perry, or of his entertaining any unfavourable opinion of his second in command. Major Chambers, though he considered this overflowing of egotism and vanity as harmless in itself, from a belief that it would never be carried farther than in boasting and complaining among those who were considered to be friends, was yet so much dissatisfied with the conduct of Captain Elliott as to request to be sent immediately on shore.

At the same or at an earlier period, Captain Elliott had commenced, among his own officers on board the Niagara, the discussion of the relative efforts which their vessel and the Lawrence had exerted towards the accomplishment of the victory. They had shared in the discredit attached to their vessel during the first two hours and a half of the action; and though Perry had rendered them partakers in the brilliant part the Niagara had acted while under his command, yet the stigma unanimously cast upon their vessel by the other officers of the squadron, and the artful efforts of Captain Elliott to identify his officers with himself, by representing, in the cases of Purser Magrath and Sailing-master Webster, that neither of them would have been mentioned in Captain Perry's official report but for him, and other similar acts of ingratiating and efforts to create ill-feeling against Perry, caused them to attempt to defend the course of their vessel throughout the whole action, in defiance of overwhelming facts, and even to recriminate on the Lawrence, giving currency to the suggestion thrown out to them, that the Lawrence, having surrendered, was not entitled to prize-money, but that, on the contrary, the rest of the squadron were entitled to prize-money for her.

Captain Elliott's first efforts among his officers resulted in the following commendatory letter to himself, signed by the wardroom officers, and dated on the Nineteenth of September.

"We, the officers of the U. S. brig Niagara, under your command, with the most profound respect, congratulate you on our late victory over the British squadron; well convinced that in you we were ably commanded, and that your valour, intrepidity, and skill could not be surpassed. You have, sir, our most ardent wish for future prosperity and happiness, both in your official and private capacity; and may your future naval course ever be as brilliant as the present."

Having, however, not yet been moulded into that frame of mind which could induce them to say or do aught that was disrespectful or disparaging to Captain Perry, the same officers addressed, on the same day, a corresponding letter to him, similar in all respects to the above, except that the expressions "our late victory " was changed to "your late victory."

Subsequent efforts among his officers and minds prepared by continued recrimination to go a step farther in defense of their own vessel, led to the production, on the thirteenth of October, of a letter from five of the officers of the Niagara, giving an account of the battle, in which it is stated that the Niagara's not engaging the Queen Charlotte, her designated antagonist, was owing to the latter having bore away from the fire of the Niagara, and joined the Detroit in her attack on the Lawrence. Whereas, in the British account of the battle, the closing up of the Queen Charlotte was stated to be in consequence of the Niagara having "kept so far to windward as to render the Queen Charlotte's twenty-pounder carronades useless." In the same official report, Commodore Barclay makes the fate of the day to turn upon Captain Perry's removing from the Lawrence to the Niagara, "which vessel was at this time perfectly fresh," and bearing up to take a raking position under the bows of the Detroit and Queen Charlotte. In the finding of the British court-martial, too, on Commodore Barclay and his officers and men for the loss of the squadron on Lake Erie, the main cause of their defeat was also stated to be the same manoeuvre—Captain Perry's hoisting "his flag on another of his squadron, which had not been engaged, and was making away." None of this evidence, nor of the concurrent testimony of Captain Perry's official report, backed by that of all the commanders and most respectable officers on Lake Erie, was in any way invalidated or contradicted by this letter of the officers of the Niagara. They did not even pretend that the Niagara had been in close action previous to Captain Perry's leaving the Lawrence. They, however, stated some new and strange circumstances; such as that, when Captain Perry came on board the Niagara, "he observed to Captain Elliott that he apprehended the action was lost, who, with the spirit and promptitude we have been accustomed to see him exert, replied, 'No, sir, I will yet try and save the day.' He accordingly repaired on board, and, taking the direction of one of the small vessels, brought the whole of them into action at close musket shot; the consequence was, that in ten minutes the Detroit and Queen Charlotte, with the Lady Prevost, struck to us, and, soon after, the whole of the enemy's squadron followed their example. The Lawrence had some minutes before this struck her colours and hauled out of the line. You will perceive, sir, by this account, that the Niagara was most usefully and energetically engaged during the action; and the gallant manner and the celerity with which the small vessels were brought into action, and the instant change effected by it, ranks Captain Elliott, in our opinion, as second to none in the late action."<sup>2</sup> The rest of the letter was filled with generalities and profuse praise of their "noble commander." The document, though artfully constructed so as to throw the delinquency of the Niagara out of view, bears internal evidence of being made to order; and is rendered of little value, since circumstances have shown the extraordinary dexterity of this officer in procuring favourable testimonials from those under his command.<sup>3</sup>

It will be observed that these five officers join in giving the words uttered respectively by Captain Perry and Captain Elliott when the former came on board the Niagara. Though the Niagara was not in close action, her crew was at quarters, and her officers must most of them have been at a distance from the gangway when Captain Perry came on board, as, indeed, Captain Brevoort states to have been actually the fact. The enemy were on the starboard side; the starboard guns were necessarily manned, and it is not likely that a single officer was present at the larboard gangway, by which Captain Perry came on board, except only Captain Elliott, who came there to receive him. From Captain Elliott, then, probably proceeded the statement of this extraordinary conversation; the real nature of it, which is so different, we have seen in the text as related by Captain Perry to Mr. Hambleton immediately after his return to the Lawrence, and set down by him at a time when no one supposed it would be the subject of such absurd misrepresentation. With regard to the pretension put forward by these officers that the day was decided by Captain Elliott's bringing up the small vessels, and their opinion that he was "second to none in the attainment of the late action," it may be sufficient to state, that, at the moment Captain Elliott left the Niagara to bring up the small vessels, then out of the action astern, Captain Perry bore down towards the enemy in the Niagara. He passed through the enemy's line, raking them from both batteries within pistol-shot, and, in fifteen minutes from his bearing up, the enemy's principal ships had struck. Both Captain Perry and Captain Elliott started upon their different errands towards the enemy and from the enemy at the same moment. The fifteen minutes employed by Captain Perry in bearing down and compelling the enemy to strike, left little leisure for Captain Elliott to speak each of the gunboats in turn, order them to hasten up into action, and then return to the Somers, which was second in the line, the Trippe having passed her, and take part in the battle. The part which was by that time left to him to perform must have been very inconsiderable. The fifteen minutes must have been exhausted, and the battle over. Again, Captain Elliott is made to reply to Captain Perry's alleged remark that he apprehended the action was lost, "No, sir, I will yet try and save the day." Another of Captain Elliott's friends, giving an account for publication with a view of reading in favour of Captain Elliott, and doubtless setting down whatever he was asked to, describes the conversation as continuing as follows: "I wish to God you would!" "Take charge of my battery while I bring the gunboats in close action, and the day will yet be ours."<sup>4</sup> After the action was over, this same witness,

Captain Brevoort, is made to state, equally, as it would seem, on the single authority of Captain Elliott, that, when Captain Elliott returned to the Niagara, "Captain Perry ran and caught hold of his hand, saying, 'I owe all this to your exertions; it has given us the day.'" Admitting the above to be true, when it is neither probable nor consistent with facts, it would prove that Captain Elliott volunteered to bring up the small vessels, a service of less peril even than that in which he was then engaged, and that he was allowed to depart on that humble errand; a work of pure supererogation, as it is presumable that the officers commanding those vessels were using every exertion in their power to get into action, though Captain Elliott reported to Captain Perry that they were not, and caused him to omit all notice of them in his official report, which he subsequently regretted. He states that he caused them to cease firing and get out their sweeps. As the breeze had by this time considerably freshened, this expedient, which might have been advantageously adopted earlier in the action, could have been of little use.

His telling Captain Perry to take charge of his battery was at least superfluous, when that was the sole object which brought Perry to the Niagara. But his taking charge of her battery in the situation in which Captain Elliott had left her would have been attended by no consequences. What Captain Perry did was first to heave the Niagara to in order to stop her from running rapidly out of the action. The next evolution was to brail up the main trysail and bear up dead before the wind, steering a whole right angle off from the course Captain Elliott had steered, running directly for the enemy instead of running rapidly past him. Upon this decisive evolution the fate of the battle had so rapidly turned, that, in fifteen minutes from the time the Niagara bore up, the enemy surrendered. This evolution, recognized by every American witness except the interested ones of Captain Elliott, and every British witness without exception, to have been the critical one upon which the fate of the battle turned, was what Barclay called making "a noble, and, alas! too successful an effort to regain the day." Yet Captain Elliott makes no claim to having suggested this manoeuvre. He merely lays claim, and his officers in his behalf and on his authority, to having requested Captain Perry to take charge of his battery, when it was for that sole purpose that he had directed his boat toward the

Niagara, saying, before he left the Lawrence, to Lieutenant Forrest, who remarked to him, "That brig will not help us; see how he keeps off; he will not come to close action," "I'll fetch him up!"

Having thus secured the endorsement of those whom he had led to believe that their reputations were involved with his in the credit to be assigned to the Niagara, Captain Elliott's next step in the plan of restoring his reputation by means of letters and certificates was in an application to Lieutenant D. Turner. This officer was the third in rank during the action, and having greatly distinguished himself in it, and being, moreover, a gentleman of the highest standing for probity and honour, his favourable testimony, if obtained, would go far to restore the reputation of Captain Elliott. Lieutenant, now Captain Turner, thus describes, under oath, the manner in which he was approached. "Some time after Captain Perry left the lake, and when the squadron was under Captain Elliott's command, he applied to me, and repeatedly urged me to give him a certificate respecting his conduct in the battle. He said that his only reason for wishing one was to have it in his power to calm his wife's uneasiness, who had heard that his conduct had been questioned; and declared to me, upon his honour, that he would make no other use of it than as a means of relieving her unhappiness. Thus delicately and unpleasantly situated, I wrote such a certificate as I thought I might, for such an occasion, venture to give Captain Elliott."

Mr. Turner having agreed to furnish Captain Elliott with a certificate, to be used, under the pledge of his honour, only for the specific purpose of calming his wife's uneasiness, a letter was, by agreement addressed by Captain Elliott to Lieutenant Turner, as in the case of the similar certificate furnished by Captain Perry for the same purpose. This letter was dated on the twenty-sixth of October, and was in the following words: "Some malicious persons have been circulating reports prejudicial to the character of the Niagara when engaged with the enemy's fleet on the tenth September last. I will thank you to say with candour if on that day she was not in her situation as arranged previous to the action, and if, during the action, every possible assistance was not rendered by her and myself individually."

The task which Mr. Turner had undertaken to perform, under the influence of an appeal not easily resisted, was still an unpleasant one. Captain Elliott had written and delivered his letter in the presence of Mr. Turner, and pressed for an answer; but it was only after renewed solicitation, and promises that his certificate would not be published, that he at length consented to furnish the following: "In answer to your note of yesterday, I have no hesitation in saying that the Niagara was in the station assigned her previous to the engagement of the tenth; and it is my opinion that you, sir, and every officer on board of the Niagara, made use of every exertion, from the different situations in which your vessel was." This ambiguous letter, if it were suited to calm the uneasiness of a wife, for which it was intended, was certainly of little value for the purpose of publication, for which it was solemnly pledged not to be used. Yet Captain Elliott subsequently published this letter in the biographical notice of himself, which could only have been written from materials and opinions furnished by him and under his inspection, and which, though it may have been revised and remodelled by some professional writer, sufficiently to relieve Captain Elliott from the responsibility of authorship, and the bad taste of overwhelming himself with fulsome and unmeasured praise, still belongs essentially to the class of autobiography. He not only publishes this letter in his book, but attempts elaborately to disprove and ridicule the idea of the certificate having been furnished by Lieutenant Turner "to calm his wife's uneasiness." In order to show that this high-minded officer, under the responsibility of an oath, had stated nothing lightly, and had not been misled by his memory after a lapse of nearly five years from the occurrence of his interview with Captain Elliott, we will here extract a passage from an original letter from Lieutenant Turner to Captain Perry, dated only two days later than his certificate, and stating the extreme reluctance with which he had given it. "I apologized for not answering his note until I could no longer avoid answering it; he assured me it would not be published, and that his wish for my note was to forward it to Mrs. Elliott, with one he received from you, sir, a few days after the action, wherein you approve of his conduct." This passage, written at a time when any public discussion of this matter was unexpected, is interesting, not merely as showing the entreaty by which the certificate was wrung from Mr. Turner, but also as containing evidence corroborative of Captain Perry's statement with regard to the circumstances under which his own certificate had been furnished, and the limited use which he expected would be made of it.

Only two days after Captain Elliott had thus told Mr. Turner that he wished his certificate to forward to Mrs. Elliott with the one which he had received from Captain Perry, the latter was published in the Erie Sentinel, under the auspices of Mr. Magrath, to whom it had necessarily been communicated by Captain Elliott. A commentary of some length from Mr. Magrath on the battle of the tenth of September, and Captain Elliott's part in it, accompanied the publication of the correspondence. Captain Elliott had excited in the mind of Mr. Magrath a feeling of ill-will towards Perry and of gratitude towards himself, by representing to him that Perry had originally omitted to mention him with commendation in his official report,<sup>5</sup> and had only subsequently mentioned his services in going in a boat during the action, at the instance and suggestion of Captain Elliott. Hence the motive of this gentleman in interfering. Still, with his mind imbittered towards Captain Perry, he does not, in this publication, utter a single derogatory expression, or state a disparaging fact. On the contrary, he fully corroborates all the various statements as to the remoteness of the Niagara during different periods of the action, when he says of Captain Elliott, "He remarked to me repeatedly in the action that we were not as close alongside the enemy as he wished; that we left their long guns too much superiority, and that he was certain, if close alongside the Queen Charlotte, ten minutes would determine the contest in our favour." As, however, he describes the Niagara, with her "main yard braced sharp aback," "frequently," it is very obvious why she could not get "close alongside the Queen Charlotte."

It would seem, from Captain Elliott's Biography, that Mr. Magrath had exercised an important part in the management of the Niagara during the action, and that Captain Elliott had yielded his own opinion to his, with regard to bearing down, in company with the Caledonia, to relieve the Lawrence from the fire of the British squadron. The Biography thus speaks of Captain Elliott: "He once thought of passing to leeward and breaking the British line; but, on consulting with Mr. Magrath, an officer of great coolness and judgment, he came to the just conclusion that such a movement would be destructive." It would seem, then, that, at an important conjuncture during the battle, Magrath determined the manoeuvre of Captain Elliott's vessel.

Captain Perry had sent his reply from Buffalo declining to make any alteration in his official report. During the interval between the departure of Perry and the receipt of his expected letter at Erie, Captain Elliott had given out that, if Perry did not write what he expected from him, he would make his own statements, and support them with his life. Throughout the autumn he continued, with unceasing activity, his efforts to obtain certificates, using the influence which his station gave him over his officers to extort them. Several masters' mates in the squadron had been advanced after the action to be acting sailing-masters, and appointed to commands. It was rumoured that these appointments would now be revoked; and this conjuncture was taken advantage of by Captain Elliott to call upon these officers for certificates. Mr. Macdonald was one of these officers. He was exceedingly reluctant to express any opinion on the subject, and yet was afraid that his failing to express a favourable opinion would lose him his situation. As no certificate from him appears in Captain Elliott's book, it is probable he gave none. He complained bitterly, at the time, of its being ungenerous in Captain Elliott to apply for such a purpose to an officer so much below him in rank. When Mr. Brownell, who was similarly situated, was applied to for a certificate by Captain Elliott in person, he stopped him at once by begging to be excused from even conversing on the subject, saying that he was sure they could not agree, and he feared he might say something to hurt Captain Elliott's feelings.

The wrecked condition of the Detroit and the Queen Charlotte rendered it difficult to remove them from Put-in Bay to a place of greater security from an attack from the enemy after the lake should become icebound. It was therefore necessary to send a force of officers and men to guard these vessels. This service was looked to with great dread by the officers, on account of the isolation and discomfort of the station; and Put-in Bay became better known among the officers at Erie as Botany Bay. Daily rumours were afloat as to who were to be ordered on that service, always, however, varying among those who were known to be most independent in their opinions, and least willing to furnish the existing commander with a certificate of good conduct; among the names oftenest mentioned were those of Lieutenants Turner and Holdup Stevens. At length, Captain Elliott had occasion to go to Buffalo. While at Buffalo he applied to Sailing-master Champlin, who then commanded the Tigress schooner, for a certificate as to the position of the Niagara during the battle. Mr. Champlin declined giving one, stating that his vessel, the Scorpion, being well ahead and actively engaged, and the Lawrence between them, enveloped, like his own vessel, in smoke, he could not see the Niagara. This answer displeased Captain Elliott.<sup>6</sup> He ordered Mr. Champlin to go immediately on board his vessel and remain there. He subsequently ordered him to proceed to Erie, on the twelfth of December, in a snowstorm which was then raging. Captain Elliott followed him up by land, and, arriving on the fourteenth, despatched him immediately to Put-in Bay. The passage was a frightful one on that boisterous lake in the middle of December. Storms, of violence and not inferior to those on the ocean, often blow there; scarcely any good harbours exist, and, of course, there is no searoom. On this account vessels are so frequently driven on shore there; and, in fact, five of the small vessels of the squadron were high and dry on some part of the lake-coast at that very time. Wrecks of this description are not unfrequently attended with loss of life, as had been the case with one of our schooners. After a frightful passage, and being frozen up four days in the middle of the lake, Mr. Champlin at length arrived at Put-in Bay.

Captain Elliott did not even abstain from endeavouring to procure testimony in his favour from the wounded British officers at Erie, who, as prisoners, should have been treated with delicacy. At a ball given by the citizens, these gentlemen were present by invitation. In the course of the evening, he questioned them with regard to the position of his ship during the action. They avoided giving him any answer, and subsequently expressed indignation at being thus addressed. Lieutenant Bignal, late commander of the Hunter, said that, if he had been urged farther, he would have stated some facts that would not have been relished; and that, had Captain Elliott belonged to the British navy, he would have been hanged; while others said that, if Captain Elliott wished a certificate from the British officers, they would give him one that the Niagara was not in a position that they could fire at her until Perry went on board of her. Finding that he could obtain no favourable testimony from the British officers, he consoled himself by the reflection that they were prejudiced against him; they were partial towards Captain Perry, because they had beaten him and taken his ship; and they hated Captain Elliott because he had changed the day, and beaten them in turn; and this reasoning is gravely reproduced in the Autobiography of Captain Elliott in the following words: "Considering, then, the general deportment of the British government towards enemies, and the general character of British accounts, the reader will be able to explain the imputed feelings of the British officers on Lake Erie towards Captains Perry and Elliott. They had beaten the first, and captured his ship; and, at the very moment when Captain Elliott was bearing down in the Niagara upon the head of the British line, the crew of the Detroit, after giving three cheers, were lowering their boats to take possession of her. Of course, the British officers entertained no asperities against Commodore Perry. He had fought them most bravely; but, in spite of his efforts, they had taken from him a fine ship, and felt towards him, as they feel towards all from whom they have taken a rich booty, very benevolent. But Captain Elliott had snatched the victory from their hands when they were most sure of it. Instead of being victors over a whole fleet, and rejoicing in the fancied invincibility of British seamen, they were prisoners of war! The royal ensign, the cross of St. George, had been hauled down from over their heads, and the stain of defeat was upon it! The world had now witnessed the defeat and capture—not of a British ship, but of—a—British fleet! Yes! the only instance of the kind on record! a British fleet, after a desperate battle, had been captured in a fair fight by a force not superior, if equal!! And who had brought this reproach upon the flag of their country? Who had cut so deep into the glories of the fastanchored isle? Captain Elliott! In the bitterness of their disappointment, they could not refrain from angry feelings or angry expressions. They hated him for the deed; and, as men seldom praise those whom they hate, the British officers could not refrain from venting their feelings in attempting to depreciate Captain Elliott."

Such is a specimen of a work, put forth, as if in consciousness of its being an outrage on public decency, without the name of either author, publisher, or even printer; a work which may be pronounced without a parallel. How painful, then, to discover, in several particulars, a coincidence of views between this disowned foundling and Mr. Cooper's Naval History? a coincidence most apparent in the effort to destroy, as a vulgar illusion of the unlightened mass, the universal feeling of admiration which Perry's passing from the Lawrence to the Niagara, in the height of the engagement, to bring the latter into close action, has ever called forth. He has attempted to show that, if there was any merit in this act, Captain Elliott exhibited it in a greater degree. "Captain Elliott was much longer in the same boat, and passed nearly through the whole line twice." And, again, he endeavours to equalize the degree of danger to which these officers voluntarily exposed themselves, by adding, "There was, no doubt, a personal risk in all the boats, but there was personal risk everywhere on such an occasion." With regard to this pretension of equality of exposure between the two officers, it may be sufficient to state, that of the total killed and wounded of the squadron, amounting, in all, to twenty-seven killed and ninety-six wounded, twenty-four were killed and eighty-six wounded at the side of Captain Perry, while, at the utmost, but four were wounded at the side of Captain Elliott. If, therefore, "there was personal risk everywhere," even Mr. Cooper will hardly deny that it differed essentially in degree.

Having at length procured all the certificates that he could, Captain Elliott announced that he had documents sufficient for his purpose. Copies of these were forwarded in various directions, or exhibited extensively by himself, with numerous oral commentaries. In his verbal descriptions then, as in his long-subsequently printed book, the battle of Lake Erie was made to assume a very new appearance. Captain Perry was made to come over the side of the Niagara in despair, exclaiming in bitterness, "The damned gunboats have ruined me, and I fear they have lost me the day!" Perry is inclined to surrender, but Captain Elliott will not listen to this. He exclaims, "No, sir! it is not lost! My ship is now in a judicious position! Take charge of my battery, and I will bring them up and save it!" and then the action is made to turn upon the bringing up of the small vessels, and not at all on the bearing up and terrible cannonade of the Niagara. The victory won, Perry is made to take hold of Captain Elliott by both hands, and tell him that he owed this to him; and he had immortalized himself; and, if he had any influence, he should be posted. In connexion with this story, and by way of fortifying it, to show that Captain Perry left the Lawrence in despair, it was asserted that he had thrown his motto-flag, having on it "Don't give up the ship," overboard on his way to the Niagara, and that it was subsequently picked up by Mr. Magrath and taken on board the latter vessel. This assertion was wholly untrue. The flag was left flying on board the Lawrence by Captain Perry, and hauled down with her other colours after he had reached the Niagara. The story was contradicted at the time by Mr. Magrath, who stated he unbent the flag and took it on board the Niagara, which vessel had become Perry's flagship. Yet this absurd story of the flag having been found afloat in the lake, where Captain Perry had thrown it in despair, though no less physically impossible than Mr. Magrath had declared it to be untrue, is gravely reproduced in the Autobiography, where also may be found most of the assertions dealt forth by him at Erie and Buffalo.

The kitchen of the village inn of the former place was one of his favourite places of declamation. There, as elsewhere, he would show his documents, boast of his standing with the president, relate the story of his former and his more recent services, and state his intention of claiming more credit, and staking his life upon the issue; and that either he or Perry should fall. It is not unfrequently the misfortune of those who boast overmuch, and are wise beyond their generation, to involve themselves in great absurdities. In one of his self-praising moods, Captain Elliott mentioned that the Niagara's missing stays off Malden on a certain occasion, in presence of the enemy, was done by him intentionally, being a stratagem to imbolden the British by the idea that our squadron was badly manned. Unfortunately, on the very next day, Lieutenant Edwards, who had been officer of the deck at the time, on speaking of the same subject, took the whole blame to himself, he having, through an error of judgment, given orders prematurely to haul the head yards.

When heated by the least opposition of opinion on the part of his officers, there was no degree of extravagance that he would not give way to in his opinions. He stated, on one occasion, that the American flag, for the first time since the declaration of the war, had been disgraced on board the Lawrence. Being reminded that she was in a sinking condition, he said she should have sunk rather than struck. Of all his various suggestions, however, the most extravagant was, that it would be a serious question between the British and American governments whether Perry were not a prisoner of war.

These sarcasms might be innocently indulged in by Captain Elliott; but when repeated by the officers, now fairly arrayed in opposing parties, the consequences were very different. Purser Magrath, who certainly could not be called a non-combatant, led the way in the first duel with Acting-master Brownell; others followed in almost uninterrupted succession; and eventually, not long after Captain Elliott's removal, young Senat, who commanded the Porcupine during the action, lost his life in a duel with Acting-master Macdonald. In order to obtain adherents among the men—for they had also been involved in the controversy about their ships, and had become clamorous partisans—they were allowed to go much on shore, and furnished with money. Not being under the restraint of a wholesome awe, they committed every description of disorder, fought among themselves about the battle, insulted the citizens, and pillaged their henroosts. The hospitals being prematurely broken up during the winter, and the invalids imperfectly attended, many of them died. Everything was misrule and disorder among a squadron which had recently been so contented. Officers and men were equally anxious to escape; the former by obtaining leave of absence, and the latter, after the prizemoney had been received, by desertion. Desertion became at length so dangerous an offense on the station, that, soon after Captain Elliott was superseded, three men were executed, two marines being shot, and one unfortunate seaman hung. All of them had been in the action, and two had been wounded. The following extract of a letter from Commodore Sinclair, soon after his arrival at Erie, conveys a lively idea of the state in which the command was delivered up to him. "I found, as you no doubt have been informed, the station in a most deplorable state. To undertake giving you an idea of it is out of the question: system, order, and discipline had given way to irregularity, disorder, and anarchy; to restore all this has cost me much labour." Such was the condition to which the squadron, left so orderly by Captain Perry without the infliction of punishment, at least in his own «hip, was ere long reduced, chiefly by the efforts of Captain

Elliott to make friends, and recover by certificates what he had lost in the battle on Lake Erie.

Let us return from the unpleasant task of reviewing these miserable transactions, which are only here adverted to because they were attended with after consequences, to follow the course of Captain Perry on his homeward journey. He arrived at Buffalo on the twenty-fourth of October, still accompanied by General Harrison and Commodore Barclay. From thence he wrote to deliver up the command of the squadron to Captain Elliott, and there he separated from General Harrison, with the kindest feelings on both parts, and from his gallant prisoner, who returned to Canada on the parole which Perry had so earnestly exerted himself to procure for him, and furnished, moreover, with an ample loan to defray his expenses. From Buffalo he wrote to his brother in England in relation to the state of his health and his hope of soon reaching that place. This letter being examined by the United States' marshal at Boston, to which place it had been forwarded, in fulfilment of his duty to examine all letters written by prisoners, he sent a copy of it to the Hon. Christopher G. Champlin, the uncle of Mrs. Perry, in the belief that it would be gratifying to that lady's feelings to notice the way in which her husband was spoken of by his vanquished enemy. The following is the closing passage of his letter. "The treatment I have received from Captain Perry has been noble indeed. It can be equalled only by his bravery and intrepidity in action. Since the battle, he has been like a brother to me. He has obtained for me an unconditional parole. I mean to make use of it to get to England so soon as my wound will permit." At a public dinner, followed by a ball, given in honour of this gallant officer at Terrebonne, in Canada, he took occasion, in reply to a complimentary speech, to notice the unusual kindness which he had received from Captain Perry; he said that his humanity to his prisoners would alone have immortalized him, and gave as a toast, in conclusion, "Commodore Perry, the gallant and generous enemy."

On taking leave of Perry, Barclay had presented him with his sextant as a memento of his regard; and some months after Perry forwarded to Barclay a highly-finished American rifle, made with the greatest possible care by a celebrated gunsmith of Albany, expressly for him.

THE journey of Perry towards his home was a triumphal progress. At every village through which he passed, the inhabitants left their toils and pressed forward to receive him; the schools were dismissed, and master and boys rushed forth to see the young hero of Erie, the deliverer of the frontier, who had stayed the tomahawk and scalping-knife of the avenging savage.<sup>1</sup> Those who had themselves been frontiersmen within the last ten or twenty years, could well appreciate the obligation which had been conferred upon their remoter brethren. Wherever Perry passed a night, illuminations, hastily-prepared festivities, and rude but hearty hospitality, conveyed to him a nation's gratitude. He was accompanied in his journey by Sailing-master Taylor, of the Lawrence; by his young brother, James Alexander; by his boat's crew; and by a revolutionary fifer, Cyrus Tiffany by name, a sort of amphibious warrior, who, having fought by land and water, and being already stricken in years, allowed himself considerable license of speech, and, having wit at will, had been a source of great amusement to the crew of the Lawrence. These officers and men were accompanying Captain Perry to his old command at Newport, whence the whole of them followed him.

imposing; and, when they were not very remote from each other, deputations accompanied him from place to place. At Utica he was presented with a complimentary address from the citizens, and invited to a public dinner, hastily prepared. From Schenectady he was accompanied along the Albany road by a numerous concourse; and at a considerable distance from the city he was met by the mayor, recorder, and common council, escorted by a corps of volunteer cavalry, and a large assemblage of citizens, mounted and in carriages, who, after greeting him with hearty and enthusiastic cheers, attended him in procession towards the city. As he entered its precincts a federal salute was fired, after which he was received in the council-hall of the Capitol by the mayor, who addressed him to the following effect: "Animated by the same sentiment which pervades the nation, the common council of Albany hasten to express their gratitude to you for your late victory over the enemy on Lake Erie. To add to the splendour of the triumph, it was achieved by an inferior force; and thus you have added new honours to the American name, while giving security to our frontier from savage barbarity. We beg leave, therefore, in testimony of the respect we entertain for your character and services, to present you the freedom of the city, and a sword, of which we ask your acceptance; fully satisfied that it will never be drawn but in defence of the rights, the honour, and independence of your country." The mayor then presented him with the freedom of the city in a gold box, and with the costly sword which had been prepared in anticipation of his arrival. Captain Perry readily replied in the following modest and becoming terms: "The honour done me this day by the common council of the city of Albany will ever be recollected with gratitude and pleasure. To merit the approbation of my country is the dearest wish of my heart. Should I ever be called again to meet the enemy, I shall bear in mind that I am a citizen of Albany, and that I wear a sword, given me under a pledge never to draw it but in defence of our country's rights, honour, and independence."

This ceremony being over, the procession accompanied Captain Perry through the principal streets to the lodgings which had been prepared for him at the Eagle tavern, where he alighted from his carriage amid the loud and long-continued acclamations of the citizens, and was conducted by the mayor, recorder, and other distinguished functionaries to his apartments. In the evening an elegant ball assembled the inhabitants of both sexes, and the ladies had also an opportunity of seeing the youthful hero, and wondering that the individual who had been so terrible to his enemies on the deck of the Lawrence and Niagara, should be here only distinguished for the courteous grace and rare modesty of his demeanour. The next day Perry was entertained at dinner by the common council, the governor, the secretary at war, the principal officers of state, and a vast concourse of citizens. Perry gave as a toast the prosperity of the city of Albany. After he had withdrawn, among the complimentary toasts in his honour was the following: "Father Neptune's settlement on his son Perry: Lake Erie in possession, the Ocean in remainder." Little Alexander Perry was not forgotten by the company; and, in reply to the compliment paid him, like a true young sailor thankful for the good cheer which so pleasantly replaced the scant and musty provender of the lake, drank, "The patriotism and hospitality of the city of Albany."

Having thus courteously yielded two days of time—which became, at each step, more precious to him as he approached his "home—to the hospitable attention of his fellow-citizens of Albany, Perry continued his journey to Newport. Wherever he passed, he received the same enthusiastic greeting, only graduated by the size of the place and the means of the inhabitants. The feeling was everywhere the same: a blended one of respect, admiration, and gratified national pride. Even the people of New-England, who had, in general been so violently opposed to the war, were carried away by the prevailing enthusiasm. His reception at Providence, may be cited as an instance. It also bears testimony to his modest demeanour and freedom from unbecoming exultation in the midst of the intoxicating effects of an adulation which might have turned many an older head.

"Yesterday morning our fellow-citizen Oliver H. Perry arrived in town from the westward. The flag of the Union was displayed, the bells were rung, and a federal salute was fired by the united train of artillery, to welcome the hero's return to his native state. We understand that he has received during his journey all the attention which his heroism and modesty have so eminently merited. The extremely modest but affable deportment of this popular young hero wins irresistibly upon the affections, and commands the respect of all who approach him. And, however we may differ with respect to the cause in which his talents are employed, yet, wherever valour and humanity, ability and modesty, are so happily blended as in Commodore Perry, adorning himself and his country, they justly receive the meed of universal praise."

At length on the eighteenth of November, Perry once more reached his home. As he entered the town the bells were rung, the shipping were dressed with national and emblematic flags, and salutes were fired from Fort Wolcott, the flotilla, and the revenue cutter. He was received by his townsmen in mass, and escorted to his home. In the evening the state-house was illuminated. But all sense of honours rendered and distinctions conferred were now lost in the claims of his family. The meeting of an attached pair after a separation of some length must, even under ordinary circumstances, be a moment of transport that cannot easily be conceived; but when that separation has been marked by painful anxieties, and those anxieties have at length been removed in so triumphant a manner, and praise has poured in from so many quarters, and the attentions of a grateful people have everywhere delayed the coming of the beloved object, the impatience must become painfully increased. One might fancy the participation of the public in admiration and attachment must become irksome, and the object almost wished more obscure to be again wholly one's own. The public approbation and attachment seem an interference with those feelings hitherto sacred. But no wife could less fear the withdrawal of her husband's time and attention than the wife of Perry. Devoted in his feelings, thoroughly domestic in his habits, the joys, the habits, and endearments of home formed a bond for him which patriotism could alone temporarily disengage. Perry's home, too, had gained a new endearment since his departure. He had become a second time a father, and his absence had necessarily had an improving effect upon the appearance of his eldest boy, then not quite two years old. His happiness is thus briefly and strongly expressed to his friend Mr. Hambleton, whom he had left wounded at Erie.

"I am satisfied you will not require an apology for my not answering your letters sooner, when you recollect that I have had the supreme pleasure of enjoying the society of my beloved family and my excellent friends in Newport. I found, on my arrival, another noble boy, and Mrs. Perry in excellent health; my oldest has grown finely, and is, in my opinion, charming. Many of your friends have made the most particular inquiries after you. They will rejoice if you again come to this place. I need not assure you how much it would add to my happiness to have so esteemed a friend with me. It is so unpleasant a subject, those ungrateful and envious fellows, that I do not like to think about them. I agree fully with you that it is best to let them alone. I have said much more in their favour than I ought to have done, but I thought I was acting for the best. I think Magrath's statement a very odd one, but, as it respects me, very harmless. I have received a note of apology from him: he is a strange character. The note addressed to me is altogether unlike the original; but truth, you know, is with some people altogether unnecessary. It was very unfair to press Turner for a certificate; but he has not given much. I have seen a most impudent letter from Brevoort, and another from Smith. How can men pretending to respectability be so far lost as to lie and prevaricate in that manner? Brevoort must have been drunk, and his dear friend have put those words into his mouth; as to Smith, Elliott told me, during the time he was on board the Niagara, he kept between two guns into the side, evidently to keep out of harm's way. You recollect, he remonstrated against my appointing him to the Caledonia, as altogether unfit for the command, and promised me a certificate to that effect. They are a despicable set of scoundrels. I did forget to mention Webster; but it was an omission which I very willingly rectified. Magrath I mentioned without the suggestion of Elliott."

There was little in the duties of his present command to divert him from the enjoyment of his home. Whatever could be done by the flotilla under his orders to protect our coasting trade, and resist the encroachments of the blockading forces of the enemy, was faithfully executed. His arrival at his home was the signal for pouring in upon him from all quarters those complimentary acknowledgments by which a grateful people sought to evince their sense of his services. Invitations to public dinners were addressed to him from all the principal cities, and tender of their services on the part of volunteer companies of troops to act as his escort. The Common Council of the City of New-York passed a series of the most flattering resolutions of their sense of his distinguished services, and that of his officers and men, in the victory of the tenth of September, accompanied by an offer of the freedom of the city, and a request that he would sit for his portrait, to be placed in their gallery. The terms in which these resolutions were conveyed to Perry, and the distinguished character of the individual who conveyed them, Dewitt Clinton, then mayor of New-York, give to this brief correspondence peculiar interest. Mr. Clinton's letter is dated on the tenth of October, and is in the following words:

"It is with peculiar pleasure that I transmit to you the enclosed resolutions of the Common Council of this city, expressive of their high sense of the glorious triumph of the American squadron under your command; an event without parallel in the annals of our country, which gives you distinguished rank among the celebrated men that reflect lustre on the American name, and which has dispensed the blessing of security and tranquillity to an extensive portion of the United States."

To this letter Captain Perry replied as follows:

"The distinguished honour conferred on me by the Common Council of the City of New-York, in their approbation of my conduct on the tenth of September, calls forth the warmest sentiments of gratitude. To perform, to the best of my ability, the duty I owe my country, shall ever be my highest ambition. The request to sit for my portrait is too high an honour not to be readily complied with. I beg, sir, that you will accept my thanks for the very flattering manner in which you have communicated to me the resolutions of the Common Council of New-York."

The result of this correspondence was the masterly portrait by

Jarvis, of Captain Perry, when in the act of boarding the Niagara; and which is not less admirable as a likeness than excellent as a work of art. It is from this portrait that the engraving at the front of this volume is taken.

Among the other pleasing circumstances that gladdened Perry's return home, and evinced the universal disposition to "reward his services, he found that his father had simultaneously received from the secretary of the navy and from the same gentleman as secretary of the treasury, the offer of appointments as captain of sea fencibles, and as collector of the internal revenue for the first Rhode Island district. He had accepted the latter appointment, and soon after removed to Bristol in order to fulfil his duties.

Having business at Washington connected with the adjudication of his prizes, and being desirous to take advantage of the favourable moment to get a number of his officers advanced, as well as of showing his grateful sense of the attention of his countrymen in the numberless invitations which he had received to visit the intermediate cities, Perry applied in December to the secretary of the navy for leave to repair to the seat of government. It was granted to him in the most flattering terms, and he accordingly proceeded to New-York, where he arrived on the sixth of January, 1814. There happened to be a public ball that night in commemoration of the victories on our frontier or of some other national event, and Perry, having been invited to attend it immediately on his arrival, yielded to the urgent requests of his friends, and went unexpectedly. A friend of the writer, who was present on the occasion, has described to him the extraordinary excitement created in the room when it was known that Perry was present. The whole business of the evening was for a moment sacrificed to the announcement; nor was it again resumed until Mr. J. O. Hoffman, then recorder of the city, had gone round arm-in-arm with Perry, presenting him to all the ladies. Through these painful consequences of distinction he bore himself with exemplary patience and courtesy. On the eleventh of January he was entertained at dinner at Tammany Hall by the republican citizens of New-York; and when called up to reply to the compliment paid him in proposing his health, he gave as a toast, "The Union of the States;" a union which perhaps no other man had recently done so much to strengthen, by blending the whole country in one sympathetic feeling of pride and joy, and awakening a patriotic enthusiasm in breasts which party spirit had closed against the call of their country.

While in New-York Perry was inducted into the Society of Cincinnati as an honorary member. He was presented with the freedom of the city in a gold box, having on the top a beautiful picture, in enamel, of the battle of Lake Erie. Here also he received a series of resolutions, passed by both houses of Congress, expressive of their sense of his conduct, and that of his officers and crew, in the battle of the tenth of September. The president had, in his opening message, noticed the victory in the following terms of praise: "On Lake Erie, the squadron under command of Captain Perry having met the British squadron of superior force, a sanguinary conflict ended in the capture of the whole. The conduct of that officer, adroit as it was daring, and which was so well seconded by his comrades, justly entitles them to the admiration and gratitude of their country; and will fill an early page in its naval annals with a victory never surpassed in lustre, however much it may have been in magnitude."

The battle of Lake Erie being thus brought to the notice of Congress, it expressed its sense of it by the following resolutions:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, that the thanks of Congress be, and the same are hereby presented to Captain Oliver Hazard Perry, and, through him, to the officers, petty officers, seamen, marines, and infantry serving as such, attached to the squadron under his command, for the decisive and glorious victory gained on Lake Erie on the tenth of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, over a British squadron of superior force. Resolved, that the President of the United States be requested to cause gold medals to be struck, emblematical of the action between the two squadrons, and to present them to Captain Perry and Captain Jesse D. Elliott in such a manner as will be most honourable to them; and that the president be farther requested to present a silver medal, with suitable emblems and devices, to each of the commissioned officers, either of the navy or army, serving on board, and a sword to each of the midshipmen and sailing-masters, who so nobly distinguished themselves on that memorable day. Resolved, that the president be requested to present a silver medal, with like emblems and devices, to the nearest male relative of Lieutenant John Brooks, of the marines, and a sword to the nearest male relative of Midshipmen Henry Laub, John Clark, and Thomas Claxton, Jr.; and to communicate to them the deep regret which Congress feels for the loss of those gallant men, whose names ought to live in the recollection and affection of a grateful country, and whose conduct ought to be regarded as an example to future generations. Resolved, that three months' pay be allowed, exclusively of the common allowance, to all the petty officers, seamen, marines, and infantry serving as such, who so gloriously supported the honour of the American flag, under the orders of their gallant commander, on that signal occasion."

The medal thus voted to Captain Perry, when executed, bore on the face his bust, surrounded by the legend "Oliverus H. Perry, Princeps stagno Eriensi, Classem Totam Contudit;" on the reverse, a fleet closely engaged, with the legend "Viam invenit virtus aut facit," and on the exergue, "Inter Class. Ameri. Et Brit, Die X. Sept. MDCCCXIII." Congress, on receiving the valuation of the captured fleet, made by a board of officers from Lake Ontario, assisted by Henry Eckford, the naval constructor on that Lake, subsequently voted two hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars for the purchase of the captured squadron. By the rule which governed this case, Commodore Chauncey received twelve thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, being one twentieth of the whole, for his share as commander-in-chief, and Captain Perry and Captain Elliott, commanding vessels of the same force of guns and men, were placed on the same footing, having each an equal share of seven thousand one hundred and forty dollars, being two twentieths of the respective shares of the Lawrence and Niagara. It was impossible that two persons should receive shares as commanders-in-chief; and, therefore, no portion of the prize-money could go to Captain Perry for his general command of all the vessels both before and during the action. To remedy this virtual, though not legal injustice, Congress, by a special grant of five thousand dollars to Captain Perry, put him upon the same footing with Commodore Chauncey. Commodore Chauncey has been censured for receiving this large amount of prize-money for a successful battle in which he took no part; but the usages of our own and other services fully entitled him to it, and he could not properly decline what belonged to him as a right. The absurdity originated with the government, in putting two stations, portions of which were nearly four hundred geographical miles remote from each other, and between which there was no navigable communication, under one command. After the state of the station had ceased to be of any paramount importance, by the annihilation of British naval power on the lake, the necessity of a separate command was recognised, and an officer appointed accordingly to command in chief. It may be well here to state, that the commanders of the gunboats, lieutenants, sailing-masters, and captains of marines received each two thousand two hundred and ninety-five dollars, the midshipmen eight hundred and eleven dollars, and the petty officers four hundred and forty-seven dollars. There was a peculiar propriety in the special grant of five thousand dollars to Captain Perry; for, even with this most unprecedented liberality of Congress, his compensation fell far behind that of other officers similarly situated. Both Commodore Chauncey and Commodore M'Donough had the lucrative agencies for the construction and equipment of their respective squadrons; a source of emolument which, on Lake Ontario, is said to have produced a handsome fortune. Perry, thinking it impossible to do justice both to this and to other and more important duties as commander of the squadron, voluntarily gave up the agency, and all the pecuniary emolument resulting from it. It is not intended, by the mention of this fact, to disparage the other two officers who held and benefited by the agencies which the government freely intrusted to them; but still to Perry belongs the peculiar merit of having given his whole heart to his country, and having worshipped glory with a single and undivided homage. One comparison between the fruits of M'Donough's victory and his own subsequently gave him pain. The State of Vermont, in gratitude for M'Donough's distinguished services, presented him with a handsome estate, which might thereafter become the resting-place of his children, where they might enjoy a heritage so honourably acquired. Ohio, whose whole lake-frontier Perry had found at the mercy of the enemy, and her territory bathed in the blood of her own citizens, and those of other states poured forth like water by the reeking knife of the savage, and which he had left free and unpolluted by the tread of an invader, and her strand ungrated by a single hostile keel—which has made him otherwise useful by calling nearly forty towns and counties by his name, and is still converting it to the convenient use of political capital—was one of the few states which had no vote of thanks for his services and those of his brave comrades.

Continuing his journey, Perry reached Trenton at a moment when the Legislature was in session. The business of the body was immediately suspended, a vote of thanks moved and carried, and committees appointed forthwith to wait upon and compliment him. Meeting everywhere with similar demonstrations of enthusiastic regard, he was received at the capital with the most cordial kindness by the president, and ostensibly by all the members of the government. Mr. Howell, one of the senators from his state, introduced him to a seat on the floor of the Senate, an honour never conferred, except by a special vote, on any but members of Congress, judges of the Supreme Court, and foreign ministers. On the twenty-fifth of January he was publicly entertained by the citizens of Washington, the mayor presiding, and the members of the cabinet and many members of Congress being present. The president took great pleasure in his society. With regard to the secretary of the navy, though he did not openly stem the tide of popular favour, Perry considered him not particularly friendly towards him. Perhaps he did not like him from the very sense of the injustice he had done him in the difficulty with Commodore Chauncey. He promised to promote his officers, particularly Mr. W. V. Taylor, who had been so eminently useful in the equipment of the squadron on Erie, but did not fulfill it without delay; he also made difficulty about giving a purser's commission to Mr. Breese, Perry's secretary, in whom he took a special interest, and for whose advancement he subsequently exerted himself with unceasing zeal until he had accomplished his object. The secretary had also suggested the idea of deducting from the valuation of the prizes—for at this time the question was not settled—the sum necessary to repair the damages sustained in the action; so, in fact, as to make the captors pay for every shot they had fired through them. The secretary, in the sequel, though he had nothing to do with the responsibility of the reward, was seriously disposed to enforce this idea; but, for the honour of Congress, it would not entertain the idea for a moment.

Having no longer motive for remaining in Washington, Perry returned homeward on the last day of January. Reaching Baltimore early in that day, he visited the Circus, by invitation, in the evening; and the spacious building was found incapable of receiving a tithe of the mighty throng that rushed towards it, filling all the approaches to it long before the entertainments began. On his approach he was greeted, both without and from the more fortunate spectators within, with hearty and prolonged cheers.

On the following day a dinner was given to him by the most distinguished citizens of both parties; the committee of arrangements being studiously made up of equal numbers of each. These gentlemen are thus named in Niles's Register: "Messrs. George Stiles, Samuel Sterrett, Isaac M'Kim and Thomas Tennant, two republicans, two federalists, four Americans." Another evidence, if any were wanted, that it had been one of the happiest effects of Perry's victory, by blending all Americans in sympathetic pride, to promote the "union of the states," and substitute for party surnames the nobler distinction of Americans. Nothing could be more complimentary than the whole character of this feast, or more enthusiastic than the spirit which prevailed at it. The spacious room in which it was given had been elaborately decorated by a distinguished artist. At one extremity was a large transparent painting of the battle of the tenth of September, representing the brilliant and decisive moment when Perry, having borne up in the Niagara, was passing through the midst of the enemy's squadron, firing raking broadsides from both batteries; while at the opposite extremity, raised above the adjoining rows of tables, was the representation of the stern of a ship labelled Niagara, on the quarter-deck of which was seated the president of the day, with Perry and the invited guests. Behind them rose a mast braced together with massive bands, on which were inscribed, in letters of gold, the names of Hull, Jones, Decatur, Bainbridge, Lawrence, Ludlow, Burrows, Allen, and Perry, while from the masthead above was suspended a banner, bearing the memorable despatch to General Harrison, "We have met the enemy, and they are ours." The orchestra was filled with amateurs, whose admirable performances contributed not a little to nourish the patriotic enthusiasm that animated every breast. This was at its height when the toast was given, "The tenth of September, 1813, rendered memorable in the annals of our country by the decisive and glorious victory on Lake Erie;" and, by means of apparatus connected with the transparency, the symbol of triumph was shown in the hoisting of the American flag over that of the enemy. When the uproar of enthusiastic exultation which the toast occasioned, and this unexpected surprise increased, was over, Perry modestly and briefly expressed his grateful sense of the honour done him, and drank, in conclusion, to the prosperity of the city in which he had been so hospitably entertained. Immediately after his departure from the room, he was thus happily complimented by name: "Commodore Perry, Erie's first and great hero: 'Exegi monumentum Ære Pere-nnius.'" More enduring, indeed, than even brass or marble, the monument which Perry has raised for himself shall last while Erie shall continue to pour her waters over the cataract of Niagara.

The ladies of Baltimore, desiring to evince, on their own account, their respect and admiration for one who had so nobly contributed to the defence of their country, and who had not merely promoted the cause of humanity by rescuing an extensive frontier from the dominion of the enemy and the incursions of his savage allies, but had exercised its noblest offices towards those whom he had vanquished, invited Captain Perry to a ball given in their name on the day succeeding the dinner. This entertainment rivalled in brilliancy that which had preceded it, and concluded a succession of hospitalities which, while they evinced the admiration of an eminently patriotic city, contributed not a little to enhance it. In the near contemplation of Perry, and in his familiar intercourse, the people of Baltimore were as much struck by the graceful elegance and rare modesty of his demeanor as they had been enthusiastically prepossessed by his heroism. The journals of the place, in their accounts of these holyday festivities, dwelt with peculiar stress on this adorning virtue of modesty as exhibited in his character; and one of them, not satisfied with its own efforts to convey to its distant readers an idea of the enthusiasm which pervaded Baltimore, sought refuge in the following appropriate quotation:

"You would have thought the very windows spoke!
So many greedy looks of young and old
Through casements darted their desiring eyes
Upon his visage; and that all their walls,
With painted imagery, had said at once,
'Jesu preserve thee!'"

Whether Perry ate his way through Philadelphia, either in going to Washington or returning from it, the writer has not been able to discover in the files of newspapers to which he has had access. Two separate invitations to dine from different committees exist among his papers; one of a date corresponding with his passage through the city to the south, the other with the time of his return. The city councils had previously voted their thanks to him and to his associates, and to himself an elegant sword, courteously consulting him as to the style and character of weapon that he would prefer, in order to render it the more acceptable. The state of Pennsylvania also accompanied its public thanks with a gold medal bearing appropriate devices.

With a heart not insensible to the honours conferred upon him by his country, Perry returned once more to the quiet and endearments of his home. In this retirement, evidences of his country's approbation still followed him, in complimentary resolutions of the legislatures of various and widely-remote states, not satisfied with the tribute of respect already offered to him through their representatives in Congress. Among these complimentary resolutions was one from the Legislature of Massachusetts, the state from whose senate, at an earlier day, and before the triumphs of the navy had partially popularized the war in New-England had issued the extraordinary resolution, "That it is unbecoming a moral and religious people to rejoice at the success of the national arms in an unjust and ruinous war." The first and only affliction of Perry's married life befell him soon after his return to Washington, in the death of his infant son, who had first seen the light during his absence on Lake Erie, and had joined to increase the happy welcome with which he had been received into his home. His letters of this period to his parents and intimate friends bear evidence of the deepest grief, and the most earnest efforts to sustain and console the afflicted partner of his bosom. In the following May Perry was ordered to Boston, to attend a court of inquiry, when the citizens of that place, without distinction of parties, and, in fact, in defiance of the distinction by which some of the most eminent of them had arrayed themselves in opposition to the war, seized the earliest opportunity that had been afforded to them of evincing their sense of the honour which the victory of Lake Erie had added to the American name. He was received in Boston with military honours, invited to review the uniformed troops of the town and vicinity, assembled in the Common to do him honour, and who received him with a salute of guns, and publicly entertained at dinner, to which he was escorted by the various uniformed corps of Boston light-infantry. In reply to the toast by which he was complimented, he gave the following just and elegant sentiment: "The town of Boston, the birthplace of American Liberty; from whence, should she ever leave the country, she will take her departure." Among the toasts given on the occasion, characterized by a point and elegance worthy of this seat of letters and refinement, and by a glowing patriotism, was the following, which will prove prophetic if America is true to herself and to her appropriate arm of national defence: "The American Navy: youngest child of Neptune, but heir-apparent to glory."

Mrs. Perry, having many relations in Boston, had accompanied her husband during this visit. The gratification of a liberal curiosity led them together to Cambridge, to examine that memorable seat of learning, interesting, moreover, in our revolutionary annals. Here also Perry's coming produced a holyday. The business of the institution was suspended. The president and faculty received him at the entrance of Harvard Hall, and conducted him through the rooms; and he was invited to review the Harvard Washington Corps, composed of students, whom the president informed him had been "permitted to appear under arms, that they might gratify their desire of expressing the emotion with which they contemplated the character and actions of Commodore Perry."

Having received an invitation from Commodore Hull and his lady to visit them at Portsmouth, where the commodore commanded the navy-yard, when the court of inquiry had terminated its sittings they went to that place, and passed a few days there very agreeably. Soon after they returned to Newport, where Perry was quickly followed by a substantial evidence that the grateful feelings of the citizens of Boston had not been exhausted by the elegant hospitalities which they had extended to him when among them. The citizens of Boston generally, at a meeting held for the purpose of testifying their sense of the services of Captain Perry, had determined to present him with a service of plate, and accordingly appointed a committee of the most distinguished inhabitants to carry out their intentions. These gentlemen procured upward of fifty different articles of real utility, and caused the principal pieces to be engraved with the following inscriptions: "September 10, 1813, signalized our first triumph in squadron. A very superior British force on Lake Erie was entirely subdued by Commodore O. H. Perry, whose gallantry in action is equalled only by his humanity in victory. Presented in honour of the victor by the citizens of Boston." This elegant and useful gift was forwarded to Captain Perry soon after his return to Newport, with a most complimentary letter from the committee. Not long after, a very elegant piece of plate was presented to him by his fellow-townsmen of Newport; and the Legislature of Rhode Island, some years after, appointed a committee to collect materials illustrative of his achievements on Lake Erie, and invited him to sit for a portrait, to be painted by Gilbert Stuart, also a native of the state.

On the thirtieth of May a Swedish brig, in endeavouring to get into Newport, was chased on shore to the eastward of the harbour by the enemy's brig Nimrod, whose boats were sent to take possession of the stranded vessel. Perry quickly hurried to the beach on horseback, with a party of seamen belonging to the flotilla and a six-pounder, and, opening a fire upon the boats, they returned to their vessel. On the following day the Nimrod stood close in, and, opening her battery on the brig, compelled the crew, with a reenforcement of seamen from the flotilla which had been sent to her assistance, to abandon her, when the enemy took possession of her and set her on fire. In the meantime, some militia had collected on the beach with two twelve-pounders, while Perry, having sent two gunboats round the northeast side of the island, through what is called the Bridge, and opened a fire on the brig, she weighed and stood to sea. The fire was quickly extinguished, and the vessel got off and taken into the harbour. Several of the people of the flotilla were wounded in these skirmishes, and one killed. The little affair the first day on the beach gave Perry an opportunity of indulging the strong desire which impelled him on all occasions to discover and advance merit. A vast number of the schoolboys from Newport had collected on the beach to see the sport, and, as fast as the shot struck in the sand, would run to seize them. Foremost among these adventurous and fearless youths was a lad not more than eleven years old, who not only exposed himself with the most utter indifference, but lent what assistance he was able in serving the gun and driving away the enemy. Perry inquired as to his name, invited him to call on him, and, with the approbation of his friends, soon after appointed him an acting midshipman.

During the summer Perry continued to exert himself to protect the range of coast intrusted to his care, which extended from New-London, through Buzzard's Bay and Martha's Vineyard, to Barnstable and Chatham, from the predatory incursions of the enemy, which had increased of late, since New-England had rallied more heartily to the national cause. From these occupations he was called, early in August, to the command of the first class frigate Java, recently launched in Baltimore. He immediately proceeded to that place to superintend and hasten her equipment. While thus occupied, the British made their famous incursion up the Potomac, with a formidable fleet and army, the result of which was the capture of Washington, and the conflagration of the capitol, the presidential residence, and the public offices, with not a few of the national archives. Almost the only resistance they met with in their attack was from the battery, manned by seamen from the flotilla under the command of the veteran Commodore Barney, who stood to his guns, resolutely loading and discharging them, until surrounded, wounded, and taken prisoner.

On the retreat of the enemy, Commodore Rodgers, Captain Porter, and Captain Perry, who had repaired with parties of seamen to the scene of danger, took their stations below the enemy on the banks of the Potomac, and prepared to annoy him in his descent. Captain

Perry had the direction of a battery at Indian Head, a few miles below Mount Vernon, consisting of one eighteen and several six pounders, brought to the spot by the Georgetown and Washington volunteers. In addition to these troops, who readily placed their pieces under Perry's direction, he was assisted by his first lieutenant, George C. Read, with a detachment of seamen. As the enemy descended the river, they opened a very sharp fire on him, which was warmly kept up until all their ammunition was expended, when they retired under cover of the bank. Only one American was killed by the fire of the enemy; ours must have been greatly more destructive, though the failure of the ammunition prevented Perry from deriving full advantage from the favourable position which he occupied. In his report to the secretary of the navy he took occasion to speak in the highest terms of the conduct of the troops associated with him, and the seamen under his orders. He had mounted himself at the commencement of this invasion, and he now returned on horseback to Baltimore.

Subsequently to the capture of Washington, an attempt of a similar nature was made upon Baltimore. As one object of this attack was supposed to be to get possession of or destroy the Java, Captain Perry devoted himself particularly to the defence of that vessel. Owing to the greater size of Baltimore, and the increased numbers which it afforded for its defence, as well as the attack being expected and prepared for, the result was very different from that of the attack on Washington. The English were repulsed in all their efforts, and driven back with great loss. During the time that Baltimore had been threatened with an attack, the mechanics had been enrolled in the militia for the defence of the place, and, being almost constantly under arms, or liable to be called out, little was done towards the completion of the Java. After the enemy withdrew from the neighbourhood of the city, with little probability of their return, the equipment of the ship for sea-service was diligently resumed.

About this time, an effort was made by some enlightened members of Congress to create higher grades of rank in the navy. With a view to obtaining information on the subject, a letter had been addressed to Perry by the honourable Mr. Tait. His reply is interesting, as showing his views on a subject of great importance, upon which he had reflected maturely. It was as follows:

"Sir,

"I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, enclosing the resolutions offered by Mr. Dana. Having had an opportunity of giving to you my opinion on this subject when in Washington, I have but little to add. That a rank above the one now highest in the navy should be established, appears to be beyond a doubt, both on account of the necessity of officers of a higher grade for the due preservation of discipline since the increase of the navy, as well as in justice to a corps that has, in all instances, exerted itself for the honour of the nation. In all our arrangements and regulations, particularly as respects the grades of officers, as far as we have gone, we have had the British navy in view. It may, then, be well to adhere to their customs as to the rank contemplated to be created.

"The subject of rank by brevet is a very delicate one. It has not been contemplated by our officers, and would possibly create some dissatisfaction. There is much, however, to be said in favour of it. It would enable the executive, for meritorious services, to give the highest possible reward."

The blockade of Chesapeake Bay continuing to be rigidly maintained by the British forces, Perry saw little probability of being able to get to sea with the noble ship to which he had been appointed, and on board of which were now assembled the flower of the officers who had served with him on Lake Erie, and many of the sailors. About this time a bill was introduced into Congress for fitting out an extensive squadron of fast-sailing vessels, to harass the enemy on his own coasts, to hang about his convoys, to cruise against his commerce generally, and burn, sink, and destroy whatever they could capture, without embarrassing themselves, or giving a predatory character to the expedition by an attempt to send in prizes. Perry, longing to be again in the way of encountering the enemy, to retort upon him the insults which he had recently offered us in our own rivers, and doubting the possibility of getting the Java to sea, now offered his services for the command of one of the flying squadrons, in which it was contemplated to divide the vessels. With the characteristic delicacy to his brother officers which he ever observed, he at the same time begged it to be understood that he had no wish to interfere with a similar application which he understood had been made by Captain David Porter.

Soon after, the bill for the equipment of these flying squadrons, as they were called in the service, became a law. Captain Porter was appointed to the command of one of them, and Perry to the other. Commodore Porter collected a number of fast-sailing privateers and letters-of-marque, and Perry, having suggested to the secretary that the purchase of private armed vessels might check private enterprise against the enemy, by his orders commenced the construction of three vessels of a heavier class, one afterward called the Chippewa, at Warren, in Rhode Island, and the other two, since known as the Saranac and Boxer, at Middletown, in Connecticut. The Chippewa, intended for Perry's flag, measured three hundred and eighty tons; the other two each three hundred and fifty. They were to mount fourteen thirty-two pound carronades, and two long twelves. The choice of model, and, in fact, the whole equipment, were left to the judgment of Captain Perry. The Saranac and Boxer were built by contract, and cost $26,000, when completely rigged, each in depreciated Treasury notes. The Chippewa, built by day's work, cost $52,000. The latter, however, had her gun-carriages, water casks, and everything but her armament. Two other brigs of the same force were afterward to have been built at Derby.

This squadron was destined, in the first place, to cruise in the Mediterranean, and subsequently on the enemy's own coast. Though the cruise never took effect, owing to the supervention of peace, Perry was already in possession of his orders, and they seem admirably calculated, carried out, as they would have been, by such men as Porter and Perry, to inflict a severe blow on our enemy. These orders are here transcribed, as being on many accounts interesting.

"Having, in the instructions from the department to Captain Porter, to which you were referred for your government, given the necessary orders for the procuring, arming, equipping and manning the five vessels destined for your command, you will, as soon as the squadron shall be ready for sea, proceed upon a cruise in the Mediterranean Sea; taking care to pass the Gut of Gibraltar under favourable circumstances, and to take such positions between Sicily and Malta, or other situations, which in your judgment shall be best adapted to the annoyance and the destruction of the immensely rich and unprotected trade of the enemy with the ports of the Mediterranean and Levant Seas.

"You will recollect that Algiers is in a state of declared war with the United States; though no declaration has as yet been made by the latter, nevertheless a state of war exists, and you will act accordingly.

"At Tunis and Tripoli I have no doubt you will be well received, and permitted to dispose of your prizes.

"In the ports of France you will also be well received, and perhaps in those of Naples; but whether any disposition may be made of your prizes there is yet uncertain.

"The main object of your cruise is the destruction of the commerce of the enemy; and, unless under particular circumstances, and with a moral certainty of safe arrival at some neighbouring and friendly port, from which you may soon recover your men again, it will be the best general rule to destroy all you capture.<sup>2</sup>

"Your continuance in those seas must depend upon your prospect of success, and the dangers and obstacles which may present themselves. Should you deem it expedient to return into the Atlantic after a fair experiment in the Mediterranean, the season will probably be so far advanced as to permit your cruising to great advantage on the coasts of England and Ireland; and, by frequently changing your position, you may avoid the cruisers of the enemy, and inflict a deep wound upon his commerce and coasting trade.

"Although abundantly justified and provoked by the lawless ravages of a barbarous enemy, it is not the intention of the government of the United States to depart from those principles of justice and morality which have ever marked its conduct; nor will it retaliate upon defenceless towns and villages the evils which its own have suffered.<sup>3</sup> The principles of public law and of civilization will continue to regulate the conduct of its officers, whose triumphs in humanity, though less, splendid, will not be less honourable and durable than those in battle."

Let the reader remember that these enlightened and eminently humane instructions were penned within a few weeks after the capture of Washington, and the Vandal destruction of its works of art, its libraries, and its archives rich in materials for history, by a secretary of the navy burned out of his office, and feel a just pride in our American civilization and humanity. Let him remember, as it was in the last, so it was in the Revolutionary war; in the midst of outrages of every sort inflicted on us at home, our cruisers went forth with the same humane instructions.

Meantime Perry still continued to retain command of the Java, and to prosecute her equipment in the event of an opportunity occurring to get her out. His family had joined him at Baltimore, and remained there until February, when they returned together to Newport. In this month the treaty of peace with England, signed at Ghent on the twenty-fourth of December, 1814, was received and ratified by the Senate and President of the United States. Thus was brought to a close a war which, had it been productive of no other results, would have been valuable to us in giving us a name and station among the naval powers of the world which will be our best safeguard from future aggression. The magnitude of the difficulties which our little navy had to meet in a struggle with the mistress of the seas, had impelled our officers to the greatest exertions in preparing our ships for efficient resistance. The discipline of our ships had been of the highest order; but it was more especially to a training at the guns, which resulted in a rapidity and accuracy of firing which had, perhaps, never been equalled, that we were indebted for our almost invariable success in all our encounters with an enemy hitherto accustomed only to victory.

Many of our citizens had doubted the justice of this war with England, and the sufficiency of the cause which led to it; others had objected to it on account of the wretched state of preparation in which the imbecility of the government had left us. Even now, at its close, some contended, with a factious spirit, that we had not obtained the chief object for which we commenced it, inasmuch as the treaty of peace did not formally consecrate the relinquishment on the part of England of the right of impressment. Of such, if any so blinded by party-spirit still exist, we would ask, Who hears of the American flag being arrested, or in any way outraged, on the great highway of nations? Who hears of the impressment of our seamen from beneath its protecting folds? We have the substance of what we went to war for, if we have not got it by stipulation of treaty, and no one dreams of its being lost. The two nations have gained by the war a mutual respect for each other, a disposition to meet hereafter on a footing of perfect equality, which, with ample preparations for defence on both sides, already made on that of England, will do more to keep the peace between them than all the efforts of diplomacy. To the promotion of this desirable result no one has more eminently contributed than Oliver Hazard Perry.

ON the restoration of peace, Perry was ordered to continue his superintendence of the three vessels of which he had commenced the construction, and which it was intended to despatch to the Mediterranean. He was, at the same time, considered as having a certain control over the equipment of the Java, which vessel it was intended should still be sent to sea under his command. During our war with England, the regency of Algiers had taken advantage of the complete employment of our navy to advance the most exorbitant pretensions for an addition of tribute over and above what was already paid by virtue of the treaty, founded upon the difference between the solar and lunar year, by which last they measure their time. During seventeen years that the treaty had subsisted, this difference would be equal to half a year, and the dey demanded that the American consul should, within twenty-four hours, pay twenty-seven thousand dollars for this alleged arrearage of tribute, and then depart from the territory of the regency, with all the Americans who might be resident in it. Though this demand was immediately fulfilled, the consul being threatened to be thrown into chains, with all the Americans in the regency, in case of delay, the Algerine cruisers were immediately sent out to capture the commerce of the United States.

These depredations, begun in 1812, were continued throughout our war with England. That being happily terminated, we had both leisure, means, and inclination to seek redress of the wrongs thus perfidiously inflicted upon us, while we were sacredly fulfilling our part of the treaty, and even submitting to exactions not contained in it. Congress, therefore, immediately declared war against Algiers. A squadron, consisting of the frigates Guerriere, Constitution, and Macedonian, sloops<sup>1</sup> Ontario and Epervier, and a number of small vessels belonging to the flying squadron, was immediately assembled at New-York, and, as a pledge of a successful and honourable result, it was placed under the command of Decatur. He sailed on the twentieth of April, reached the Mediterranean on the fifteenth of May, captured a frigate and brig belonging to the dey, which were cruising against our commerce in the Mediterranean, and, appearing off Algiers on the twenty-eighth of June, compelled the dey to conclude a treaty on board the Guerriere—for he refused to treat anywhere else—by which treaty the dey bound himself to restore all the American property which he had captured since he commenced hostilities, or its full equivalent, release all the Americans whom he held in captivity, and relinquish for ever all claim of tribute from the United States. It was, moreover humanely stipulated, that in no future war, should any occur, should the citizens of the United States, captured by Algerine cruisers, be consigned to slavery, but treated as prisoners of war until regularly exchanged. Another article conceived in the spirit of humanity was, that in no case should hostilities be commenced by either party until the dissatisfied party should first state its alleged wrongs, and wait three months for an answer.

The three vessels building under Captain Perry's direction were intended to proceed to the Mediterranean. In the Chippewa the writer commenced his professional career, under the auspices of Captain Perry, having received from him an appointment as acting midshipman in March of 1815. In fulfillment of the orders accompanying this appointment, he proceeded to Warren, where the Chippewa was building. There he had several times occasion to see Captain Perry on his periodical visits to examine the brig, and note the progress and manner of her equipment. Captain C. R. Perry lived at that time at Bristol, about four miles from Warren. Thither the writer frequently went by invitation, to pass a day or two in one of the most attractive domestic circles to which it has been his good fortune to be admitted. Captain Perry, the father, was then but fifty-five, a man of elegant and commanding person, having the appearance of still retaining a good portion of the remarkable strength and activity for which in his younger days he had been distinguished; his features were regular and striking, and his manners exceedingly prepossessing; at least, such was the impression they made upon a lad not quite twelve, on a first absence from home, who sensibly felt and gratefully remembers the benevolent efforts of the old gentleman to entertain him with anecdotes of past adventures in the profession upon which he was entering, and useful lessons for his guidance. The same good-humoured efforts to amuse a homesick child, whose only attraction consisted in being a good listener, were conspicuous in Mrs. Perry, whose flow of interesting and agreeable conversation was as unceasing as it was delightful. The attractive manners of the daughters harmonized pleasantly with those of their parents, who were still of an age to take pleasure in all their pastimes. The two youngest sons were then at home, and the three elder occasionally joined the domestic circle, which was the perpetual scene of affectionate intercourse, and free-hearted though not ostentatious hospitality.

On one or two occasions the writer was present when Perry passed an evening under the paternal roof. He brought there, in his mature years, the same affectionate feelings towards the different members of his family, the same interest in their pursuits and pastimes, which are said to have characterized his boyhood. Taking the flute, he would play with a gratified air, which showed that he was receiving as well as giving pleasure, while his brothers and sisters, with such guests as might accidentally have entered, were dancing; or, passing the instrument to his father or one of his brothers, he would take his own turn in the more exhilarating exercise. So much freshness of feeling, so much warmth of affection seemed singular, yet were doubtless reconcilable enough, in one who had already filled so large a space in the thoughts and admiration of his countrymen.

Having seen the completion of the three brigs which he had been engaged in superintending, and which it may be well here to state proved to be admirable sailers, and in all respects efficient men-of-war, he received instructions early in May to proceed to Baltimore and resume the command of the Java. The three brigs still, however, remained under his orders. The following officers had been appointed at his suggestion to command them: Lieutenant G. C. Read to the Chippewa, Lieutenant J. H. Elton to the Saranac, and Lieutenant J. Porter to the Boxer; most of the subordinate officers also received their orders from him. The first vessel was soon after placed under the orders of Commodore Bainbridge, who had his flag in the Independence, and despatched with him to the Mediterranean. On the eighteenth of July Perry reported the remaining two brigs ready for sea, and his control over them soon after ceased. About this time he was unofficially questioned as to whether it would be agreeable to him to enter the navy board, in which there was at that time a vacancy. He preferred retaining command of the Java.

On the fifth of August the Java dropped down from Baltimore to Annapolis, to receive on board the remainder of her stores. While at anchor off that place, long the capital of the state, and the seat of wealth, refinement, and hospitality, the inhabitants tendered to Captain Perry and his officers the courtesy of a public dinner, which the shortness of his stay there, and the urgency of his occupations, compelled him to decline. On getting under way from his anchorage, he fired a salute in compliment to the city.

From Annapolis the Java soon after dropped down to Hampton Roads, to receive some spare spars which had been made for her at Norfolk. She had originally been ordered to repair to Boston to complete her equipment for a cruise; for it had been decided, after a survey had been held on her at Baltimore at Captain Perry's request, that the whole of her standing rigging would require to be replaced, and that she was in many respects defective as delivered up by the contractors. While she was in Hampton Roads, the secretary of the navy determined to send her to New-York or Newport instead of Boston, and gave orders accordingly. This change of intention was occasioned by the financial difficulties of the day, and the fluctuating value of money at different points, which rendered it more easy for the government to make disbursements at New-York than at Boston, treasury notes being at par in New-York, while in Boston they were at a discount of fifteen per cent.

The Java was ready to sail from Hampton Roads on the twenty-sixth of August; but a succession of easterly gales commenced blowing about that time, which detained her near a fortnight. During their continuance it blew on one occasion with great violence; several vessels arrived dismasted, and a number drove from their anchors in the Roads and went on shore. With topmasts and lower yards down, and four anchors ahead, the Java rode out the gale without injury. On the sixth of September she put to sea, and arrived off Sandy Hook on the ninth, but did not get to anchor within the harbour until two days later. Considerable time was passed in preparing the Java for sea. A complete new gang of standing rigging had to be fitted for her, and new carriages for nearly the whole of her main-deck guns. During the whole of her subsequent cruise, some new defect was from time to time discovered. Her construction and equipment were nearly complete before Captain Perry joined her. She had been built by contract, and the fulfillment of their obligations by the contractors had not been sufficiently watched on the part of the government.

The ship was still longer delayed at New-York, in consequence of the government being somewhat undecided as to the manner of employing her. During this time Perry commanded afloat in the harbour of New-York, where many vessels of war were at that time lying. In the month of December, a project had been conceived by Commodore Porter of an expedition of discovery and protection to commerce round the world, to embrace an extended visit to the islands of the Pacific, the Northwest Coast, Japan, and China. Several vessels were to be employed on this service, under the command of Commodore Porter, and it was proposed to hoist his flag on board the Java, and employ her on that service, if it was agreeable to Perry. Not understanding, at first, that there was to be any senior officer to himself engaged in the service, Perry was disposed to embark in it; but finding afterward that it was contemplated to give him a superior, and, in fact, to make his command of the ship which had been conferred upon him for gallant service dependant upon his willingness to serve as second in command on a remote expedition, from which he could derive only a secondary share of honour, he declined going, and even considered himself wounded by the proposition. This little misunderstanding, however, did not interrupt his friendship for Commodore Porter, towards whom he continued to entertain the liveliest sentiments of admiration and regard.

Thus fell stillborn the first American project for a voyage of exploration; and when we reflect both on Perry's position at the time, and how such expeditions have since been conferred on the score of rank, it must be admitted that his pretensions were not inordinate, nor his objections to a secondary station unreasonable. Soon after this question was resolved, apprehended difficulties in the Mediterranean, growing out of a dissatisfaction of the Dey of Algiers with the treaty which, under compulsion, he had concluded with Commodore Decatur—which dissatisfaction was fomented by the other consuls, who considered our treaty a reflection upon their nations—induced the government to give orders for the Java to be got ready to sail immediately for the Mediterranean. On the sixteenth of December, the same day that his order was transmitted from Washington, the Java sprung her beam abaft the fore hatch, to which the after cable-bits were secured, while riding out a gale of no great violence in the East river at New-York. This detained her a few days to have the defective beam replaced; and as her crew was not complete to the cruising complement, the ship was ordered round to Newport, to await her sailing orders and receive the residue of her crew. It is indicative of the financial embarrassments of the day, that the Java, on leaving New-York, was obliged to leave her purser in pledge for the debts of the ship. The requisitions transmitted to the government for the necessary funds to meet her disbursements remained unanswered, and the purser was eventually indebted for his redemption to Mr. Barker, the president of the Exchange Bank, who cashed his requisitions.

On the sixth of January, 1816, the Java sailed from Sandy Hook, and arrived at Newport in twenty hours. The writer having completed a cruise to the Mediterranean in the Chippewa, now joined the Java at Newport, and can draw on his own recollection, corroborated by the logbook and letters of Captain Perry in his possession, for the events of the cruise. A few days after the arrival of the Java at Newport, an event occurred eminently illustrative of Perry's active humanity, and special desire on all occasions to interpose for the preservation of shipwrecked and drowning seamen.<sup>2</sup> On the morning of the tenth of January, the wind blowing a gale and the weather being intensely cold, Perry, while seated at his breakfast, surrounded by the comforts of his home, and the tender endearments which were rendered more valuable by the consideration that so brief a season still remained for their enjoyment, received the appalling announcement that a vessel had been wrecked during the night on the Seal Rock, off Brenton's Neck, which forms the southeastern entrance to the harbour of Newport, and that a number of her crew had been seen clinging to the wreck, over which the waves were dashing furiously. He instantly left his house with one only prevailing thought uppermost in his breast, that of saving these unfortunate mariners. It is the custom of the service for a commander to send a midshipman, a master, or, at most, a lieutenant, on service of this nature. Perry's only idea was to go himself. He disliked the elegant but frail gigs ordinarily used by our commanders, and always took for himself a large and substantial boat, that united the quality of speed to that of being dry and buoyant. His tastes in this respect were doubtless influenced by his humane desire to aid any who might be in need of his assistance, and proved most useful to him on this occasion. He found his barge at the wharf, with its crew of twenty stout fellows, and Barney M'Kain, who had been in his boat when he passed from the Lawrence to the Niagara, for a coxwain. Stepping into his barge, he said to his crew, "Come, my lads, we are going to the relief of shipwrecked seamen!" His speech on this occasion, like his letter on another, was all that the occasion required. Springing to their oars, regardless, like their gallant commander, of the severity of the cold and the power of the storm, they forced the boat forward at a rate which soon overcame the distance of five or six miles which separated them from the objects of their solicitude. They were barely in season to save the wretched sufferers. The vessel had gone to pieces; and on the quarter-deck, which formed the largest fragment, the crew, to the number of eleven, had lashed themselves to the rail, at each instant drenched by the freezing spray. Perry rescued these unfortunate men, some of them almost in the act of dissolution, and seconded, as hitherto, by the utmost energies of his brave crew, hastened with them to his ship, and soon had the supreme pleasure of restoring all of them to animation and health. The act was its own best reward, which cannot be enhanced by any commendation of ours.

On the twenty-first of January the purser arrived from New-York, having settled his accounts just at the right moment, and with him came Lieutenant Dulany Forrest, with the ratified treaty of peace with Algiers, despatches for Mr. Shaler, our consul at that place, and orders to proceed on our destination. It blew, however, a gale from the southeast, and it was impossible for us to move. On the following day the wind shifted, and we stood out of the harbour in the afternoon, with the first of a northwester, and the prospect of a very rapid passage, which was fully realized. Indeed, we were driven across the Atlantic at a rate which, perhaps, has never been equalled by a sailing vessel. On the eighth day out we passed the Western Islands.

A day or two after, while running before the wind, one of the crew, who, contrary to the regulations of the ship, had been towing a blanket over the bows to save the trouble of washing it, got it foul of the hook of one of the bowsprit shrouds, low down on the bow of the vessel. Whether the poor fellow was unwilling to lose his blanket, or apprehended being called to account if it should be found by the first lieutenant, with his name on it, in a situation which plainly indicated an infraction of a necessary regulation, he though a landsman, undertook to do what the most skilful seaman in the ship would have shrunk from at such a time: to go down by the bowsprit shrouds to the bow of the vessel, when it was frequently plunged in the water, and disengage his blanket. The ship, even more than fast vessels in general, was wet and uneasy, and rolled and pitched after a peculiar fashion of her own. The poor fellow had profited by a smooth time to get down and disengage his blanket, when the ship, making a tremendous plunge, and a wallow which brought the water to the cathead, disengaged the poor fellow, and sent him far away from the bow on the top of the wave. As the vessel passed on she approached him again, and with one or two strokes he was alongside of her, and, as she went by him at a speed of ten or twelve knots, he shrieked imploringly for assistance.

The midshipmen were assembled at school within a screen of canvas under the half deck on the larboard side, which was the same on which the poor fellow had fallen. There was a scupper between the two guns where we sat, and the ship rolled to port as the man passed, bringing him within two or three feet of us, and bearing his shrieks, which conveyed the inevitable impression of death-notes, to us with horrible distinctness. We all ran on deck, where the appalling cry of "man overboard," then heard by the writer for the first time, had been clamorously repeated. The ship was running dead before a strong gale, under double-reefed fore and main topsails and foresail. The helm had been put at once hard to starboard, and, as the ship rounded to, the foresail was hauled up, the topsail halyards let run, and the reef-tackles hauled out. She thus approached the wind under very short canvas; but the power of the wind and sea threw her over as she came broadside to, sending everything and everybody to leeward with tremendous violence, and seriously injuring a number of persons unaccustomed to the sea, or whose sympathies had made them forgetful of themselves. A slushbucket, which had been used in setting up the mizzen-rigging, and which got adrift on the deck, added to the number and seriousness of the falls; and the marines and after-guard, who were working the braces to heave the ship to, were hurled with violence to leeward. Preparations were making for hoisting the mizzen staysail, and the lee-quarter boat was ready for lowering, with plenty of volunteers at hand to man her, when the captain saw that it would be not only impossible to reach the man, owing to the violence of the sea, but there would be the greatest danger of losing the boat's crew. Meantime, the poor fellow had struggled manfully for his life. He could be seen from the mizzen-top, whence his position was each instant reported, and the mizzen-rigging, which was strung from the top down with lieutenants and midshipmen, swimming steadily in the wake of the ship; and it was evident that he had advanced considerably, from his hat being some distance behind him. At length the captain of the top reported that he could see him no more, though his hat was still visible; and, bearing up, we stood again on our course, with the same speed as before, but with a pervading sadness through the ship. The captain, whom I had hitherto looked on as the most enviable of men, appeared to me in any other light when I beheld him torn by conflicting emotions in his anxious desire to save the drowning man, and unwillingness to expose many lives to almost certain loss in the attempt. It has been the necessary fortune of the writer, in the prosecution of his career, to witness many similar scenes; but the memory of that first one has remained indelibly fixed; and those terrible shrieks, heard, as he passed, almost within an arm's length, seem still, when remembered, to vibrate painfully on the ear.<sup>3</sup>

On the fourteenth day out we were within a hundred miles of being up with Cape St. Vincent, after a run of unexampled speed, when, soon after meridian had been reported, the main-topgallant-sail, which had been set during the morning for the first time in several days over a double-reefed topsail, was ordered to be taken in, and was accordingly clewed up, and the men sent aloft to furl it. Ten men were on the yard— for the ship was very heavily sparred— when suddenly the wind freshened, and the main-topmast parted above the cap and went over into the larboard waist, carrying the main-topsail-yard with it, and dragging after it the mizzen-topgallant-mast. By this deplorable accident, solely occasioned by the spar being dry-rotten, five of the men engaged in furling the topgallant-sail lost their lives; one struck on the muzzle of a maindeck gun, and was precipitated overboard, where he immediately sank; another fell with his head on the keel of a boat, turned bottom up on the booms, and had his skull completely divided: three others lost their lives in modes equally horrible, and many were mutilated.

The spectacle which the ship presented at this moment was truly harrowing. Shorn of her lofty spars, the mizzen-topgallant-mast dragged nearly over to the maintop, the main-topmast and main-topsail-yard, with the topgallant-mast and yard hanging over the larboard gangway nearly to the water, now swinging off from the ship's side as she rolled heavily to port, now thrashing violently against the side and main rigging as she returned to starboard, and all the while some five or six of our men clinging to the topgallant-yard, the topmast cross-trees, and different parts of the wreck, watching an opportunity to detach themselves from it and reach a place of safety in the main rigging, with an earnest anxiety equalled by that of the agonized spectators, while, at the same time, shrieks and groans, proceeding from the wounded and dying on different parts of the decks, and pathetic cries for assistance from others in the top, crushed with a terrible pressure by the rigging which sustained the weight of the suspended wreck. The pain of a bloody and hard-fought action could scarcely surpass that of such a scene. As the readiest means of relieving the unfortunate men still clinging to the wreck, the ship was immediately rounded to on the larboard tack, so as to bring the wreck to windward, where it became stationary, and those who had been taking such a terrific swing were speedily rescued.

On clearing the wreck and getting down the fragments of the mast, it was found entirely rotten; and, on inquiry among those who were best acquainted with the equipment of the ship, instituted by a formal survey, the spar was found to have remained, with others, exposed to the sun and weather in Baltimore for nearly two years. Others of the ship's spars were found in the same predicament, and were, at the earliest occasion, replaced. The after part of the maindeck on the starboard side became a temporary cockpit, and Doctor Parsons, who had been so active and useful on Lake Erie, and had saved so many lives there, had for some hours occupation for all his skill. Almost every operation in use in surgery was required to alleviate the sufferings of the wounded. The man who had fallen on the boat was quickly trepanned, though scarcely any hope existed of his recovery, and he soon after died. Ere long, four of the killed were decently laid out, dressed in white frocks and blue trousers, and placed side by side on gratings standing upon shot boxes; and, on the following morning, they were sewed up in their hammocks, and committed together to the deep. From the gloom occasioned by this dreadful casualty, the ship was long in recovering, and the impression can never be effaced from any one who witnessed it.

One ludicrous incident, which, when first stated, provoked an unseemly though irresistible smile, connected itself with the accident: it is illustrative alike of the reckless character of the sailor and the Irishman. One of the men on the main-topgallant-mast engaged in furling the sail was a humorous and cheerful Irishman, by the name of Dennis O'Dougherty. It happened at this time that a gang of hands was employed in passing the shot from the main-deck battery into the shot-lockers below, to relieve the excessive rolling of the ship; and Dennis, being precipitated from the maintopgallant-yard, struck the main-stay, and, bounding towards the main-hatch, dropped among the group waiting until the shot was taken from them, and, knocking the shot out of the hands of one of them, landed on his feet with the brief ejaculation "Here's Dennis!" and walked off as unconcerned as if he had been making any ordinary excursion. The man became a sort of privileged character, like old Tiffany, the revolutionary fifer, who had played before the tent of Washington, and served with distinction on Lake Erie; and the expression "Here's Dennis!" became a cant phrase among the men, and a species of apology for any sudden intrusion.

The loss of our main-topmast, and a gale of some violence which soon after occurred, delayed us twenty-four hours; we then made sail on our course. On the twenty-first day out from Newport, being on the thirteenth of February, we arrived off Gibraltar, and, after communicating with the shore without anchoring, we made sail for Malaga, and arrived there on the following morning. A day or two after we arrived, the captain went on shore to pay his respects to the governor, and, having passed the remainder of the day with the consul, was returning to his boat in the night, when he was rudely interrupted, in front of the guard-house on the quay, by the sentinel throwing his musket in front of him, probably from having passed on his post; at the same time, another soldier stepped out, and laying his hand on his shoulder, attempted to arrest him. He pushed them both from him with violence, and, drawing his sword, advanced upon them, when they made off, leaving him in possession of the post. The captain returned at once to the consul's and, taking him with him, proceeded to the governor's, and, stating the insult that had been offered, demanded reparation. The governor ordered the officer of the guard to be placed immediately under arrest, and promised that the affair should be properly inquired into, and justice awarded where it might be due.

Sailing from Malaga on the twenty-second of February, we arrived at Port Mahon on the seventh of March. There we found the frigate United States, Commodore John Shaw; Constellation, Captain Charles Gordon; Erie sloop, Commander William Crane; and Ontario, Commander John Downs. After remaining a few weeks at Mahon, the whole squadron sailed on the fifth of April for Algiers, off which place it arrived on the eighth of the same month. There we found the English fleet, under Lord Exmouth, consisting of six line-of-battle ships, two frigates, three sloops, a bombship, and several transports. It was anchored in line of battle before the batteries, with a view of giving effect to a negotiation that was then going on for a new treaty, which should recognize the same principle which Decatur had secured for us; namely, that our citizens, captured by Algiers during war, should no longer be reduced to slavery, but treated as prisoners of war, and exchanged without ransom. That Decatur's treaty led to this British expedition, and eventually to the bombardment of Algiers, there can be no doubt. Brenton, the naval historian, in his account of what occurred, says, "It was not to be endured that England should tolerate what America had resented and punished." In fact, the dey's disposition to annul our treaty grew almost entirely out of the annoyance which it occasioned to other powers, and the intrigues of their consuls. In a letter to Mr. Hambleton, soon after his arrival in the Mediterranean, Perry tells him, "The Algerines are extremely restive under the treaty made with Decatur, considering it disgraceful to the Faithful to humble themselves before Christian dogs. These feelings are encouraged, and their passions fomented by the consuls of other powers, who consider the peace we have made a reflection upon them!" He subsequently received personal confirmation of this fact.

Lord Exmouth had already secured the admission of this principle, first secured for the United States by Decatur with regard to the non-enslavement of its citizens, from the beys of Tripoli and Tunis, and had visited Algiers with the same motive. In the Dey of Algiers, by name Omar, a man of stern and decided character, he met with a less compliant spirit. The dey declined giving an answer on this subject until he could communicate with the sultan; and an Algerine minister was despatched in the British frigate Tagus to Constantinople to bring back an answer, for which three months were allowed. It had been also part of Lord Exmouth's instructions to procure the liberation of all Christian slaves, which he accordingly demanded unconditionally. This demand was rejected; but, on farther negotiation, all the Neapolitan slaves were given up on the payment of three hundred and fifty-seven thousand dollars, and the Sardinians on the payment of twenty-five thousand five hundred dollars. The Neapolitan and Sardinian governments had, of course, empowered the admiral, through their consuls, to treat for the liberation of their subjects on these terms. In fulfillment of this convention, about twelve hundred captives were set at liberty, and embarked on board the transports in attendance on the British fleet; people of all ages, clothed in rags, many of whom had grown old in captivity, with gray beards descending to their girdle, and whose removal from this land of bondage, with the near prospect of a return to their homes, afforded an affecting spectacle. It was a noble and a magnanimous act for Britain thus to claim the liberation of captives of weaker nations, and to insist on securing for them whatever she obtained for herself; still this negotiation, terminating in the payment of a valuable ransom, had a tendency to encourage the custom of kidnapping Christians engaged in the commerce of the Mediterranean, or residing on the opposite coasts. It elated the Algerines; and the writer saw for himself that, on the departure of the British officers, immediately before the sailing of their fleet, they were insulted by the populace, which threw dirt and stones at them, and otherwise treated them with contumely. It may be well here to remark, that the arrangement made by Lord Exmouth, so much less honourable than that which Decatur had imposed with a tithe of his force, created great dissatisfaction in England; and news about the same time arriving there that, on a recent massacre of the Neapolitan and Corsican fishermen who resort to Bona, within the regency of Algiers, to carry on the coral fishery, the British flag had been torn down from the consulate and trampled on, Lord Exmouth was immediately sent back with a more formidable fleet, with orders, if necessary, to bombard Algiers into submission, which he effectually executed.

On the departure of Lord Exmouth after his first visit to Algiers, Commodore Shaw and Mr. William Shaler, then our consul, had an audience of the dey, and presented to him the ratified copy of Decatur's treaty, which had come out in the Java. Elated by his recent advantages over Lord Exmouth, whose negotiations had been so formidably sustained, he affected not to understand the object of offering him this new copy of an instrument already in his possession; and, after the two treaties had been read, though word for word similar, he intimated that there was a difference. He then stated the real motive of his dissatisfaction, which was, that the brig captured by Decatur's squadron on the coast of Spain, and seized by the Spanish government on the ground of its having been captured within its jurisdiction, had not been delivered up in fulfillment of our treaty. It was explained to him that, in the treaty, we had merely relinquished our claim to the brig, and that he must demand her of the Spanish government. This, however, he also refused to understand, and broke up the conference with the remark that the Americans were unworthy of his confidence. On the following day Mr. Shaler asked for a second audience of the dey, which was refused; but he had an interview with his vizier, who returned the offered treaty with insulting expressions. Immediately after this interview, Mr. Shaler struck his flag and withdrew on board the frigate United States.

By Omar's refusal of the copy of the ratified treaty he seemed to have declared it at an end, and preparations were forthwith made in the squadron for an expedition with all the boats, manned with twelve hundred men, to destroy the whole Algerine navy as it lay moored within the Mole. Part of the force was to be directed against the water batteries, which were to be scaled and the guns spiked, so as to facilitate the escape of the party destined to board and fire the ships. Captain Charles Gordon was to have commanded the expedition, with Captain Perry as his second in command. The squadron was in a fever of excitement from the moment this bold idea was conceived; every officer and man became a volunteer for the service; scaling and hook ladders were speedily made, cutlasses and pikes ground, and firearms put in the highest order for service: greater enthusiasm for an enterprise never prevailed.

This blow was to have been struck the same night on which the consul withdrew. Every preparation had been made, and complete success must inevitably have attended it, thus sparing to Lord Exmouth, on his return to Algiers, the destruction at least of the dey's navy. Some scruples, however, existed as to the propriety of commencing hostilities in the face of that article of the treaty, introduced in our own interest by Commodore Decatur, which stipulated that either party having cause of complaint should give three months' notice before the commencement of hostilities. From the following note from Mr. Shaler it would seem that he was of the opinion that we could not be bound by the terms of a treaty which one party had refused, and that Perry, to whom it is addressed, coincided with him in the propriety of the enterprise. Perhaps Mr.

Shaler hoped to bring the dey to declare the treaty, with all its provisions, wholly at an end. "I have received the interesting extracts you have sent me, and I am perfectly of your opinion, my dear sir, that on this occasion everything should be done to elevate the national character. I think that a glorious occasion offers. We have only to seize it with prudence ; and circumstances are such that all the prudence in the fleet is necessary in the management of this affair. I confidently expect that in a few days something may be achieved worthy of notice. I even expect that a ray of glory may be added to your brow. I shall go on shore in the morning, leaving the draught of a note here. I beg that you will give your opinion upon it. I am exceedingly anxious that something appropriate to the occasion should be sent. This is very important."

The result of this business was, that, being deferred from day to day, the preparations were discovered by a French frigate and reported on shore, which led to extensive preparations to meet and repel the attack. Had it still been made, it would probably have resulted in the destruction of the Algerine ships, but necessarily with great loss on our side. After a council of war, the attempt was eventually abandoned, on the ground that, as the treaty, though not ratified, had been in force since its negotiation by Commodore Decatur, who had been fully and specially empowered to treat, it was so far binding upon us as to require an interval of three months before commencing hostilities.

The project of attack being thus abandoned, Captain Perry was instructed by the commodore to land under a flag of truce, and wait on the dey, with a view to the renewal of the negotiations. He carried with him the ratified treaty, in the event of the dey being disposed to accept it. Captain Perry landed in company with Mr. Nordeling, the Swedish consul, and was met at the Mole by the captain of the port, to whom he stated his desire to hold an interview with the dey on business of importance. Our warlike preparations prepared for this new envoy a more respectful reception, and, after a few moments' delay at the house of the Swedish consul, the dey signified his readiness for the interview, and Captain Perry was ushered into his presence.

The dey stated that we had broken the treaty by not returning the

brig and prisoners, and therefore it was at an end; that we were at liberty to avail ourselves of the article which required three months' notice to be given before the commencement of hostilities, so as to receive instructions from the President of the United States, or, if we thought proper, we might commence hostilities at once. If it was determined to take advantage of the three months' delay, the consul might land under the old treaty, and would receive every mark of respect; the ships should be supplied with whatever they might require, and the officers might visit the shore with perfect safety. He added, that he felt no desire to go to war with the Americans, as he felt for them the greatest respect. Captain Perry "gave a positive denial" to the dey's accusation that we had violated the treaty; reciprocated, on behalf of his government and of the commodore, the respectful feelings expressed by the dey; and promised a prompt answer to his proposition. Captain Perry remarked, in the communication reporting what transpired to the commodore, that, throughout the conference, the deportment of the dey was manly and dignified, his manner being perfectly free from everything like menace, and his treatment as respectful as he could possibly desire. He also stated that he could not avoid expressing the opinion, forcibly impressed upon him at the time, that all the consuls present at the time, being the British, French, Spanish, and Swedish, with the exception only of the last, evinced an unfriendly feeling towards us, and a desire to influence the dey to our disadvantage.

The necessary result of Captain Perry's conference was the return of Mr. Shaler to the shore, the rehoisting of our flag at the consulate, and the renewal of our former relations, until new instructions should be received from the President of the United States. Of our distinguished consul-general at Algiers for so many years, Mr. William Shaler, it may be proper here to state, that he was a man eminently qualified for this post by his superior talents, his calm dignity of manner and immovable firmness, and that he would have adorned the highest diplomatic station in which he could have been placed. He always had vast influence over the government and people of Algiers. He had little respect for them as a military power, though he always did justice to the extraordinary qualities of Omar, the reigning dey on the occasion of our visit, and who afterward resisted with so much energy the attack of the British fleet, exhibiting in his own person a brilliant example of courage and self-devotion. Mr. Shaler's able work on Algiers is particularly admirable for the accuracy of his local descriptions; it is also memorable for having convincingly shown, that the place which had effectually resisted the utmost efforts of the most powerful sovereigns could be easily overcome. It formed the manual of the French in their successful attack, and was most implicitly followed by Bourmont. Had Mr. Shaler foreseen such a result of his publication, he would doubtless have abstained from revelations which have tended to the aggrandizement of so ambitious a power; if, indeed, as now appears uncertain, the capture of Algiers is eventually to be productive of any aggrandizement to France.

From Algiers, the Constellation, Java, Erie, and Ontario were ordered to visit Tripoli, to see that all was quiet there, and that our consul was treated with respect. Having fulfilled this object, the four ships proceeded to Syracuse, and thence to Messina and Palermo. Learning at the latter place that Tunis had begun to assume a warlike tone towards our country, and the American merchants in Sicily feeling some alarm for the safety of our commerce, the four ships assembled in the Bay of Tunis on the eighteenth of June. Finding all quiet there, a state of things which their opportune visit tended doubtless to perpetuate, the ships dispersed in prosecution of farther orders, and the Java, having only a fortnight's provisions on board, was ordered by Captain Gordon to proceed to Gibraltar for supplies.

At Gibraltar the Java fell in with the Washington<sup>4</sup> line-of-battle ship, bearing the broad pendant of Commodore Chauncey, and having on board Mr. Pinckney, our minister to Naples, with his family. It is believed that Commodore Chauncey and Captain Perry had not met on terms of friendship since the unpleasant misunderstanding which had occurred during their service on the lakes, which had led Captain Perry to tender the resignation of his command. The successful result of his Lake Erie service had probably gone far to remove from the mind of Perry all sense of the injustice and wounding expressions which he had received from Commodore Chauncey; while, on the other hand, it is believed that the commodore, even while assuming a tone of censure and reproof towards Perry, had never felt unkindly towards him. Both were men of good hearts, and naturally upright and honourable characters.

The ordinary intercourse of duty brought them together on board the flagship, and the presence there of a gentleman of high diplomatic rank and distinguished personal standing, with his family, no doubt contributed to smooth the way to a reconciliation. At any rate, they became once more friends, and continued to be warm and useful ones to each other ever after.

About the middle of July the commodore sailed from Gibraltar for Naples, where he arrived on the twenty-second of the same month. The Java, which was now in a high state of order, and which everywhere attracted attention as a most beautiful ship, accompanied the Washington. The whole squadron ere long assembled in the Bay of Naples. While the minister, who had landed with the customary state, under a salute of guns, was soon plunged into the midst of diplomatic perplexities with a shifting and time-serving government, reluctant to indemnify us for the spoiliations committed on our commerce in former years, while under the compulsory government instituted by Napoleon, we had our own internal troubles in the squadron, which lay in a threatening attitude in the bay to give effect to the minister's diplomacy. At that time the younger officers of the service were infinitely more disorderly than now, more given to intemperance and all its baneful consequences. To check this disorder, great efforts were made by the commanders of the different vessels, among whom were some, perhaps, too rigid disciplinarians. As insubordination often begets tyranny, and tyranny again insubordination, the two, reacting, created at length a painful state of things. There was a deadly opposition at that time among the different grades of officers. The maxim had been put forth—more in earnest, perhaps, than was intended—that there was no law for post-captains; and the converse of the proposition, that there was no ready and cheerful obedience for inferiors, was also in a fair way of being illustrated. Captain Perry was a strict and exact commander, enforcing rigid discipline in his ship; still he was disposed, on all occasions, to exercise equal justice to his inferiors, and repress any approach to an overbearing tone. An anecdote, not wholly forgotten by the writer, but more freshly recalled in its details by Mr. C. O. Handy, then acting chaplain of the Java, which occurred at Naples, will happily illustrate the uncompromising independence of Perry's character and his high sense of duty.

A court-martial, of which he was president, was sitting for the trial of several midshipmen, upon charges preferred by the captain of the Washington. The allegation against one of them set forth that he had outstayed his liberty while at Annapolis, for which offense he had been continued under arrest across the Atlantic. The modest and boyish appearance of the youth excited much interest in his behalf. He appeared with one of the lieutenants of the Washington as his counsel, who, in the course of his remarks, bore upon the captain with a good deal of severity. The latter, who appeared as the prosecutor, interrupted him by an appeal to the court, to know if one of his lieutenants could be permitted thus to appear in his uniform, and criticise his conduct. Captain Perry replied that he did not appear as one of his lieutenants, but as counsel for the accused. The prosecutor immediately rejoined, that he protested against the proceedings of the court, and insisted that his protest should be entered on the record. Perry forthwith ordered the court cleared, and, upon its reopening, summoned the captain of the Washington to its bar, and thus addressed him, in a tone and manner of calm but severe dignity: "Sir! I am instructed by the court to inform you that it refuses to enter your protest on its minutes, and that it considers your conduct highly indecorous, and cautions you not to repeat it." The captain, thus rebuked, immediately exclaimed that he intended no disrespect to the court. It should be remarked that a close intimacy existed between the two commanders, which had been the fruit of long association in service. The incident only temporarily interrupted this intimacy, which was soon renewed. As for the midshipman, he was acquitted on this charge, proof being elicited that he had already been sufficiently punished.

Nothing definite was at this time obtained from the Neapolitan government towards the settlement of our claim. Towards the close of August the squadron proceeded to Messina. While in this port the navy lost a most valuable officer in Captain Charles Gordon, of the Constellation, who, after many years of suffering from the effects of a wound, died lamented by all who knew him. In him Perry lost a warmly-attached friend, just at the moment that he needed all that he could rally around him. It was only a few days after the burial of Captain Gordon, which took place, with every demonstration of respect, on the tenth of September, that Perry became involved in the unpleasant and painful difficulty with Captain John Heath, who commanded the marine guard stationed on board the Java. That this gentleman was generally inattentive to his duty there can be no doubt. Among Captain Perry's papers there are no fewer than three letters to him from Captain Heath, apologizing for neglect of duty and trifling offenses against the discipline of the ship.<sup>5</sup> These letters prove that he was not a good officer, but at the same time prove, no less by their existence than by their tone and manner, that he had no settled purpose of infringing the discipline of the vessel, or of wounding or annoying Captain Perry, whose business it was to sustain it. The writer can barely recollect him as a good-natured, rather fat, unmilitary-looking, and exceedingly indolent man, who wore his hands in his pockets on the quarter-deck, and his hat on one side, less with a view apparently of annoying the captain than for the comfort of being at his ease. The first serious cause of offence which he appears to have given to Captain Perry was in going into the Bay of Naples in company with the commodore, when, the ship being in perfect order in all other respects, the captain remarked that the marine guard did not correspond with the rest of the vessel. He pointed out to Captain Heath one marine who was particularly untidy, and asked why he was permitted to appear on deck in so dirty a dress. To this question Captain Heath returned what Perry conceived to be a disrespectful and contemptuous answer, which no doubt imbibited his feelings against him, and prepared the way to the unpleasant scene that followed. It was to this and other unpleasant incidents that Captain Perry referred, in writing to Commodore Chauncey, when he said, "The general deportment of Captain Heath towards me, so contrary to the usual address of my officers, and, moreover, his marked insolence to me in many instances, induced me to believe that his conduct proceeded from a premeditated determination to insult me."

Perry being thus prejudiced against Captain Heath, on the evening of the sixteenth of September two marines jumped overboard, in an evil hour for themselves and others, and attempted to swim ashore. Perry hurried on deck when the circumstance was reported to him, took instant measures for the recovery of the men, and sent for Captain Heath, whom the matter doubly interested, the offense being committed by marines, and, moreover, implicating the sentinels for a want of vigilance. Captain Heath, caring more, probably, for the comforts of his bunk than for the safety of the missing marines, declined coming on deck, and sent word that he was indisposed. Perry, however, repeated the order for him to come on deck, and, when there, ordered him to muster the marines. He did muster them, but in a very careless manner; and, when mustered, failed to report them, as was his duty, until called by Perry and ordered to do so. "Conscious," Perry says, "that such an occasion ought to animate the most careless and inattentive officer to decision and promptitude, I was induced, from such a manifest neglect of duty, to say to him that he might go below, and should do no more duty on board the Java." Here Perry was manifestly wrong. Captain Heath had been ordered to the Java by the secretary of the navy; besides, there was a commodore in the port, whose duty it was to judge of such matters. It may, however, be said, in Perry's justification, that the remark he made on this occasion, though improper, is not unusual in the service; and the captain making the remark being generally able to keep his word, the matter ends there.

Two days after this occurrence, Perry, having been absent from his ship, returned on board at a late hour, when he found on his cabin table the following note from Captain Heath:

"Sir,

"On the evening of the sixteenth instant I was ordered below by you from the quarter-deck, with these words, or to that effect: 'I have no farther use for your services on board this ship.' I have waited till this moment to know why I have been thus treated, and, being ignorant of the cause, request my arrest and charges.

"Very respectfully, &c,
"John Heath."

Captain Perry considered the language of this letter indecorous and disrespectful, and was particularly offended at the time which had been chosen to send it to him. The language of the letter does not seem to us objectionable, nor could the time of its delivery, though unusual and improper, render language, in itself innocent, offensive. Perry thought otherwise; he was labouring under the maddening irritation of that delusion which, even if it were a reality, he should not have heeded, as, had he been an older man and an older commander, he probably would not, that Captain Heath entertained "a premeditated intention to insult" him.

For his own misfortune and that of his biographer, who else would have had the pleasing task of tracing a life unsullied by a single serious fault, Perry sent for Captain Heath in this moment of frantic passion. On Heath's entering the cabin, Perry asked him why he had thus addressed him and at such an improper hour. Heath immediately replied in a tone and manner which Perry conceived so highly irritating and contemptuous, that he thought proper to arrest him, and sent for the lieutenant of marines to take charge of him and receive his sword. To the order to consider himself under arrest, Captain Heath said "Very well, sir!" in a tone which Perry conceived insulting and contemptuous. He ordered Captain Heath to be silent; Captain Heath replied after the same fashion. The order for silence and the reply to the order were thus repeated, until, as Perry says, "Passion became predominant, and I gave him a blow." Had passion become predominant at the same instant in the breast of Captain Heath, and had he returned the blow which he had received to the best of his ability, it would have been fortunate for both of them. It would doubtless have been as strange as it would have been a painful spectacle, such a rencounter in the cabin of a frigate between her commander and one of his officers; but it would have wonderfully simplified the after-discussion of the subject. Whatever would have been horrible in the transaction had already occurred. The blow given had violated the seal of state attached to Captain Heath's commission, and dishonoured the majesty of the nation in the person of its solemnly-appointed officer. A regular set-to would have brought the question within the jurisdiction of club-law; and the parties being thus upon an equal footing, the quarrel would have remained a private one, of which the public might never have heard.

Captain Heath retired from the presence of his commander as an officer under arrest. The following day was a gloomy one on board the Java. The officers and crew had the most profound respect for their commander, and were strongly attached to his person; the victim of uncontrolled passion, he became an object of their pity; he was himself overcome with shame and mortification. Gordon was no more; but he had still sincerely-attached friends, who hastened to rally round him and offer their assistance. Captain Crane, then in command of the Constellation, a warm friend of Perry, and a man of commanding intellect, became his chief adviser. After consultation with him and Lieutenant J. Macpherson, first of the Java, Perry agreed to place himself in the hands of those gentlemen, who forthwith addressed a joint note to Captain Heath, stating, on behalf of Captain Perry, his deep regret at having offered violence to Captain Heath, and his perfect "readiness to make an honourable and personal apology, such as would be proper for Captain Heath to receive and for Captain Perry to make."

By this time, all the marine officers of the squadron had poured into the wardroom of the Java, full of the impression that the whole marine corps had been knocked down in the person of Captain Heath, instead of looking upon it as an accidental rencounter, having nothing to do with any particular corps. The members of the marine corps on the station were men of the highest honour, but on this occasion they gave their comrade very injudicious advice. It must have been obvious to Perry and his friends, that, according to those laws of honour which, however absurd they may be esteemed, military men cannot be the first to abrogate, this was an offence for which there could possibly be but one species of atonement. Instead of returning answer to the friends of Captain Perry, that if he, having passed the barrier of rank which separated him from Captain Heath to outrage his person, would still consider his rank out of the question, Captain Heath would then point out the nature of the atonement he would be willing to receive, Captain Heath, with the advice of his friends, returned answer, "The injuries which have been inflicted upon me by Captain Perry are of such a nature that I cannot receive any apology he can offer as an atonement, but rely upon the laws of my country for justice."

A day or two after these overtures were thus, unfortunately for both parties, rejected, Perry was sent to sea in the Java, having the Constellation and Erie under his orders, to cruise off Cape Passaro until joined by the commodore. Having fallen in with him, the squadron bore away for Tripoli, and thence went to Tunis, where it arrived on the eighth of October. All hope of adjusting the difficulty with Captain Heath having now failed, Captain Perry, on this day, submitted a statement of the affair to the commodore, and requested that a court-martial might be convened for the investigation of his conduct. He soon after brought charges against Captain Heath for neglect of duty, unofficer-like conduct, disrespect, insolence, and contempt of his superior officer.

From Tunis the squadron proceeded to Algiers, and thence to Malaga and Gibraltar, at which last place it arrived early in November. While on this passage down the Mediterranean, an interesting incident occurred, which gave the officers of the Java and of the whole squadron a lively idea of the admirable seamanship of Perry, and of his extraordinary energy when excited by the hope of rescuing a perishing fellow-being. The whole squadron was standing down the Mediterranean, before a brisk Levanter, running nine or ten knots, under a press of canvass, from studding-sails on both sides to skysails. Lieutenant Dulany Forrest being at the time officer of the deck, was standing in the starboard gangway in conversation with Mr. Fitzgerald, the purser; rather an improper occupation, to be sure; but such things sometimes happen when the captain is below. A boat had been down during the day, and the man-ropes, instead of being unrove and the gangway stopped, were coiled up over the headboard. Forrest was a gay, chivalrous young fellow, and something of a dandy. He was now booted and buttoned to the chin, in a very unsuitable condition for swimming, and was lounging in the gangway, holding by one of the bites of the manrope, when it slipped from the headboard and carried him into the water. He lost his hold of the man-rope in the water, and, coolly remarking to his late companion, "Tell them the officer of the deck is overboard, Fitz!" passed rapidly astern.

The dreadful cry, to which one never gets accustomed, brought the captain on deck. He took the command in person; and, raising his clear, sonorous voice, which, in its higher tones, we had rarely heard before, he brought the ship by the wind, gathering in her sails as she came to with the speed of magic; and the men, doubly inspired by the desire of saving life and the animating and unusual presence of their captain giving the word of command with rare tact and judgment, exerted themselves to the utmost. In less than three minutes the ship was by the wind under snug sail; the boat was immediately lowered, and, pulling rapidly astern in the direction designated from aloft, Midshipman T. R. Handy, who stood in the bow of the boat, directing her course so soon as he caught sight of the drowning man, had the satisfaction literally to catch him by the hair of the head as he was sinking below the surface for the third time. He was brought on board apparently lifeless, but the skilful application of the surgeon quickly restored him; and, soon after, the captain had the satisfaction of explaining to the commodore the object and result of a manoeuvre which had been contemplated with mingled anxiety and admiration by the whole squadron.

At Gibraltar Commodore Chauncey found instructions from the government, appointing him, with Mr. Shaler, commissioners to negotiate a new treaty with Algiers. Through the friendship of Perry, and his own superior qualifications for the post, Mr. C. O. Handy, acting chaplain of the Java, was appointed secretary to the commission. The commodore sailed for Algiers in fulfillment of this errand, and the commissioners were successful in negotiating a new treaty, upon the basis of that of Commodore Decatur, and solemnly establishing all the important principles secured to us by that treaty. The brig which had been captured by Decatur on the Spanish coast, and seized by the authorities in Carthage, had been delivered up by Spain to Algiers, which removed the chief ground of previous misunderstanding. Commodore Chauncey arrived at Mahon with his ship late in December. He immediately announced to Captain Perry that, this being the earliest moment at which the public service would admit of a compliance with his request for a court-martial, it would now be ordered for the investigation of his difficulty with Captain Heath; though he stated that he had received no complaint or charges from that officer against Captain Perry. The court having been convened on the thirtieth of December, the trials of both now took place. The result was, that Captain Heath was found guilty of the charges brought against him by Captain Perry, as before stated; and Captain Perry also found guilty of having struck Captain Heath. Both were sentenced to be privately reprimanded by the commander-in-chief, after which they were restored to duty on board the Java. The respective punishments were certainly not proportioned to the offences; and Perry, having been tried upon so flagrant a charge, should have been more severely dealt with. The consequence of so lenient a punishment was, that he got the residue from the public press on his return to the United States.

These trials being over, the Java was ordered home with the newly-negotiated treaty with Algiers.

Before taking leave of this interesting sea, it may be proper here to state, that, throughout all our cruising in it, the captain facilitated and encouraged, by every means in his power, visits on the parts of all grades of officers to whatever was interesting in and about the ports in which we anchored; granting leaves of absence, for as prolonged periods as the duty of the ship would permit, to those who were desirous of going to interesting cities in the interior, and furnishing the largest of the ship's boats, under the care always of an officer of rank and experience, to such as were anxious to visit points of classic association on the coast, particularly in the neighbourhood of Messina, Syracuse, Tunis, and the storied Bay of Naples. The works in his own well-selected library having reference to the past history and the existing antiquities of these venerable regions, were freely placed at the disposal of the curious, and all encouraged to read. On every occasion he manifested the most ardent zeal and persevering interest in the improvement of the younger midshipmen. They were compelled to devote a given portion of each day to studies connected with their profession, under his own eye, in the cabin, the forward part of which he relinquished to them for this purpose. A competent teacher was always on board to teach them French and Spanish; and a good swordsman, to render them skilful in the use of arms. Even the lighter accomplishment of dancing, which their early removal from home might have prevented them from becoming proficient in, was not neglected. Having prepared these facilities for improvement, he made it his constant business to see that they were not neglected; and many a reluctant wight was compelled, by the terrors of a displeasure which, though only exhibited by a few brief words of admonition, few were willing to encounter, to labour for his own advancement. The writer, in the course of his service, has known but one commander so devoted to this important portion of his duties as Captain Perry; this one was perhaps more devoted only because he was more successful, having to deal with a less dissipated, less disorderly, and less wayward class of midshipmen than were then to be found in the service, among whom the "roaring Javas," the cognomen by which they became long after celebrated, were conspicuous.<sup>6</sup> There were, however, many honourable exceptions, as the columns of the navy register will still testify.

Perry took the most unbounded interest and pride in the appearance and condition of his ship. Her order, neatness of equipment, and accuracy of evolutions were always conspicuous; and her cabin was ever the seat of an elegant and appropriate hospitality. Himself an admirable musician, the band of the Java was always the best in the squadron; and its stated performances at the hoisting of the colours and at the close of day essentially contributed to maintain contentment and cheerfulness throughout the ship. Every germ of excellence that he could discover among the crew was carefully fostered, and even the singer of a good song was sure of his quota of encouragement. This attention to whatever could render the ship ornamental to the eye of the visitor and happy within, led to no sacrifice of the essential attributes of an American man-of-war. The ship was always ready for service, her battery in perfect preparation for battle. In this respect Perry was the same in the Mediterranean as he had been on Lake Erie.

We sailed about the twelfth of January, 1817, from Mahon, and, after encountering head winds nearly all the way, arrived at Malaga on the twenty-fourth of the same month. Here we fell in with the United States' storeship Alert, and received a supply of provisions. We sailed from Malaga on the twenty-fifth, and, reaching Gibraltar the following morning, anchored for a few hours to receive some additional supplies, after which we weighed in the evening, and stood to sea with a fine Levanter, which we were all anxious not to lose before getting out of the Mediterranean, and no one so much so as the captain. For several hours during the night we ran at the rate of twelve knots; even the homeward bound could desire no better breeze. We ran the trades down with the usual delightful weather, but on approaching our own coast we met with very severe weather; and the ship, being defective in her construction, and already partially decayed, suffered severely, leaking so badly through the waterways as occasionally, in heavy weather, to keep all the pumps going. Canvass nailed over the waterway seams, with tarred oakum, was resorted to with partial success. The winter, indeed, had been uncommonly boisterous, and we fell in with many vessels as we approached our own coast, the crews of which were exhausted from fatigue and want of food. Our captain had the satisfaction of relieving a number of them, and, notwithstanding his impatience to arrive, never hesitated a moment to run out of his course when he saw a vessel having the appearance of being in distress, even without the customary signal. This led us to board many vessels, to which we afforded relief. One of them proved to be fifty-nine days from Bristol, Rhode Island, bound to Baltimore. She had been blown off the coast several times, and the crew were in an almost perishing condition.

Our own ship was also the scene of painful suffering on the passage. Previous to leaving the United States, the captain had caused all the crew to be vaccinated who had not distinct marks of having been vaccinated previously. This practice had not been universal among the other ships of the squadron; and, the day after our departure from Gibraltar, a case of smallpox occurred among the seamen sent home from the other ships on account of the expiration of their term of service. In questioning the rest of the men from the other vessels, eighteen were found who had not been vaccinated; and the vaccine matter that remained on board proving to be defective, these men were inoculated, and, being carefully dieted, recovered almost immediately. Eighteen others, who had failed to report themselves, took the disease in the natural way, and four of them died; three others of the pulmonary invalids from the other ships yielded to the severity of the weather and died. All this sickness gave scope, as usual, to the exercise of the unwearied benevolence which Perry ever exhibited towards the sick under his command. He daily visited them, and inquired as to their condition and wants and never failed to send from his own table whatever could be grateful to the convalescent. Whenever there was any one out of health in the steerage or cockpit, the captain's steward, an old-fashioned Narragansett negro, by the name of Hannibal, with a huge mouth, elephant-like teeth, and a perennial grin, might always be seen descending cautiously the steerage ladder in search of the sufferer, with some dainty from the cabin table, or some tempting preserve from the family-stores, provided for such an emergency by the forethought of woman.

At length, on the third of March, we arrived at Newport, and Captain Perry again resumed those domestic relations which no man ever more fully owned the force of or more thankfully enjoyed. He immediately wrote to his friend, Mr. Hambleton, by his secretary, Mr. C. O. Handy, who was despatched to Washington with the treaty. In resuming his correspondence with his friend, he says to him, "As Handy will probably give you a detailed account of my cruise, I shall say nothing about it any farther than that it has afforded me both pleasure and pain. I shall have much to say to you when I see you. I have, by some means, made out to get a host of enemies about me; but, as I was not capsized by the clamour of popular applause, the noisome breath of the envious and malicious will affect me but little." Here he was mistaken, as we shall see in the sequel. But he presently turns to endearments where he was safer from disappointments. "I have applied for this station, and intend to devote myself to my family. My boys are, I think, fine little fellows. How happy I should be to have you added to the number of my comforts in Newport. I hope to prevail upon you to spend a part of the summer with me. I am happy to hear that my little property in the Bank at Georgetown is doing so well. It is time for me to begin to look about me, and nurse what little I have." The last sentence alludes to the portion of his prize-money which was not dissipated in the expenses which his celebrity imposed upon him. Though not profuse and never in debt, he had a large heart and lived generously, practising too extensively the divine philosophy, "it is more pleasant to give than to receive," to increase his hoards or add to his possessions.

After remaining a month in Newport the Java was ordered to Boston, where she arrived on the fifth of April. She was soon after dismantled, and he was transferred once more to the command of the Newport station. The duties of this command occupied but a portion of his time, and he devoted all his leisure to the care of his family, and the claims of a circle of well-chosen, intelligent, and warmly-attached friends. Soon after he repaired to Newport, the gunroom officers of the Java, still remaining on board of her, joined unanimously, with the exception, of course, of Captain Heath and two who were absent, in an affectionate letter of farewell, which has been found among his papers. This was a free offering of their hearts intended only for his eyes; unsuited for, and not intended for publication. As, however, we have not refrained from recording his extreme misconduct to an officer in a fit of ungovernable rage—the only one which, in a life of anxious duties, he ever gave way to—it is but fair to insert here a few passages from this outpouring of grateful hearts, to show the impression that he made upon those who knew him best.

"You are about to relinquish the command of the Java, and we to separate from you, perhaps forever. Will you permit us, with the deepest regret for the loss of one with whom we have been so long associated, to lay before you the tribute of our gratitude and esteem? We have seen you in every vicissitude incident to the tumultuous profession of arms, and everything has contributed to augment the esteem which our hearts spontaneously formed. Whether in the hour of perilous achievement, of unequalled triumph and success, or in the quiet circle of domestic life, we have ever beheld the same self-devotedness, the same unshaken fortitude and patience, and the same diffusive kindness. We, sir, owe you no common obligations. During a year of painful separation from the dearest objects of your affection, you have ever been diligent in contributing to our comfort, and zealous in promoting our interests. In your leaving the Java, we have not only to lament the loss of a beloved commander, but of a zealous and devoted friend. Among the many interesting features of your character, we have recognised with pleasure a steady and unyielding friendship; a promptness to perceive and reward the merits of your officers. It has been said that obligation always created a heavy burden that soon wearied the wearer. But the favours you have bestowed upon us are of a different character. They have tended to cement our hearts the more closely to virtue. You have been the watchful monitor of our errors, as well as the faithful rewarder of our good conduct. We believe that with you we have acquired a fixed character; and while we have in remembrance the distinguishing traits of yours, every vicious inclination will be suppressed. We cannot but hope that some fortunate concurrence of events will hereafter place us again under your command. To that period we look with impatient expectation, while we earnestly hope that you may reap, in the happiness of domestic life, the richest reward of the virtuous heart; and, when you look back to the busy scenes of other days, we beg we may occupy a place in your recollections."

This letter was signed by Lieutenants Macpherson, M'Call, Turner, Stevens, Forrest, W. V. Taylor—all of whom, except one, had been with him in battle—Lieutenant of Marines Howie, Acting-chaplain Handy, and Sailing-master Mull. Most of these officers still survive, and are most honourably known in the profession.

Dr. Parsons having been absent from Boston when this letter was addressed to Captain Perry, separately took a friendly leave of him in a letter, from which the following is extracted, chiefly as illustrative of what has been heretofore said of that most distinguishing trait of his character, his active and persevering humanity to the sick, the wounded, and the unfortunate.

"Understanding that you have relinquished the command of the Java, in which I have had the honour of serving under you for more than two years, permit me, on our separation, to tender you my grateful acknowledgments for the very friendly and generous solicitude with which you have at all times regarded my best interests and happiness. It is but just to say, that the mere performance of my duty has ever given me a certain passport to your friendship and favour, and I shall ever regard it as the happiest incident of my life that I was so fortunate in being placed under a commander who has ever been exceedingly active in advancing the improvement and welfare of his officers.

"Permit me also to express the feelings with which I shall ever bear in mind your treatment to sick and wounded seamen. In you they have ever found a kind, attentive commander and sympathizing friend. Your prompt attention at all times to whatever I could suggest for the preservation of health or the benefit of the sick, your diligent inquiries into all their wants, and frequent appropriation of all your private stores for their comfort, are among the numerous acts of beneficence which can never be forgotten by them or me. In short, to your humane exertions is attributable any extraordinary success that has ever attended my practice during the four years I have been under your command."

Perry employed on Surveys.—Revival of his Difficulty with Captain Heath.—Assailed by the Press.—He determines to meet him.—Refuses to return his Fire.—Hostile Demonstration of Captain Elliott.—Perry's Forbearance.—Correspondence between Captain Elliott and Perry.—Perry prefers Charges against Captain Elliott.—Not acted on by the Government.—Captain Heath challenges Perry.—Is arrested in Rhode Island.—Perry proceeds to Washington.—Returns to New-York.—Duel between Perry and Heath.

IMMEDIATELY after the return of the Java, Perry was employed on a survey of the line-of-battle ship Independence, to ascertain whether she should be continued at her then rate, or cut down to a frigate, she having been found to carry her lowerdeck guns too low. He was of opinion that, by reducing her masts and quantity of ballast and stores, so as to raise her bodily out of the water, she would make an efficient and formidable ship. It is to be regretted that the expedient had not been adopted instead of cutting her down, as the writer is convinced, from having sailed in her, that all her old defects would thus have been remedied; whereas, in the process of cutting down, many new ones have been substituted, and her appearance, originally so beautiful, destroyed. He was also employed, in connexion with General Swift, of the engineers, and Commodores Bainbridge and Evans, to examine the eastern entrance into Long Island Sound, and the harbour of Newport, with a view to ascertaining the practicability of defending the Sound and harbour by fortifications, and also to examine the coast north of the Delaware, for the selection of a proper site for a naval depot and dockyard. The commission decided that it was impracticable to defend the entrance of the Sound; but practicable to defend Newport, and expedient to do so; and also to construct fortifications at the entrance of Fisher's Island Sound. The commissioners did not agree on the subject of the naval depot, but reported separately. Captain Perry was in favour of Fall River, in Mount Hope Bay, which certainly combines many eminent advantages for a great naval establishment. Perry had scarcely settled down to the quiet enjoyment of his home, when the agitation of his difficulty with

Heath, by the public prints, began to afford him infinite pain. No doubt the national sense of justice was shocked by the insufficient nature of the punishment by which the court-martial had requited his offence; and the conductors of the press, in their vocation as redressers of grievances, conceived themselves called upon to mete out to him the deficient residue of justice which his somewhat partial peers had withheld. The very phrensy of enthusiasm which had existed throughout the public mind in his favour gave conspicuousness to his offence, and rendered him the more prominent mark for daily animadversion. Captain Heath had influential friends in Virginia, who brought his case—and it was truly a hard one—before the public by means of pamphlets and paragraphs, and the press throughout the country re-echoed the accusations. Friends and admirers were not wanting to draw in his defence, and recall the memory of his splendid services; but what is the slight titillation of praise to the rankling wounds inflicted by abuse and villification? Personal abuse had not attained that high pre-eminence and that unrestrained excess throughout the country which now leaves no security for the most virtuous or the least obtrusive; but still there were not wanting censors in those days, who, with so much subject for animadversion, could sharpen their pens for the infliction of deep and festering wounds. To a man of proud and sensitive character, retiring in his habits and inclinations, and hitherto accustomed only, when drawn before the public, to unbounded and enthusiastic praise, it must have been bitter indeed to find himself placed, as it were, on the pillory, the mark for every unappropriated shaft. That he acknowledged and deeply deplored his fault in yielding, though but for a moment, to the dominion of passion, there can be no doubt. Still, sometimes he became hardened under the chastisement which was too freely inflicted; and the consciousness of his real worth, a sentiment of which no rancour of persecution could deprive him, excited him to resistance. This feeling is apparent in the following extract from a letter to one of his most intimate friends:

"I am undetermined whether I shall visit Washington this winter. Your Southern gentry have treated me with so little ceremony, that I shall remain with those who know me, and wait until my services are required, when it is possible they may become more complaisant. I mean those who have thought it such a terrible offence to chastise one impertinent and insolent fellow."

The single fault of his character, the haughty pride of spirit and the impetuous temper, habitually restrained by modest amiability and gentleness of demeanor, and which only once in his life had broken its barriers and revealed itself in an overt act, may be traced in this passage, which we have quoted that the character of Perry may be seen in its defects as well as in its beauties.

At this conjuncture Perry was far from being abandoned by his friends. Many senators and representatives, who had sought his friendship on his return from Erie, took the present appropriate occasion to remind him of their still active regard. Decatur and Porter, a host in themselves, with others of honourable name in his own profession, hastened to make him aware of their attachment and sympathy. President Monroe, who visited the Eastern States in the summer of 1817, took particular pains to mark his high sense of Perry's merits, and the strong personal attachment which he had long before conceived for him. The president took passage, during part of his tour of inspection of the eastern harbours, on board the brig Enterprise, to which the writer was then attached, and Perry attended upon the president in the character of aid, to which he had been temporarily appointed, and accompanied him in that capacity throughout a considerable portion of his tour. The compliment was well timed, and gratifying to his feelings.

It was not until the close of the year that measures were taken by Captain Heath to bring his difficulty with Captain Perry to the only issue that would satisfy the feelings of his corps, or was, indeed, likely to restore Captain Perry to his former favourable station in public opinion, which, with all its scruples, is still the great abettor of the system of duelling. This issue he would doubtless have encountered immediately after the commission of the outrage. When, therefore, it was intimated to him that Captain Heath was about to call upon him for personal satisfaction, he determined to grant it, and placed his honour at once in the safe hands of Decatur and Porter for the necessary measures to gratify Captain Heath's requirements. On the eighteenth of January, 1818, he wrote the following letter to Commodore Decatur:

"My Dear Commodore,

"You are already acquainted with the unfortunate affair which has taken place between Captain Heath and myself. Although I consider, from the course he has thought proper to pursue, that I am absolved from all accountability to him, yet, as I did, in a moment of irritation, produced by strong provocation, raise my hand against a person honoured with a commission, I have determined, upon mature reflection, to give him a meeting, should he call on me; declaring, at the same time, that I cannot consent to return his fire, as the meeting, on my part, will be entirely an atonement for the violated rules of the service. I request, therefore, my dear sir, that you will act as my friend on the occasion.

"Very truly your friend,

"O. H. Perry."

"Commodore Stephen Decatur."

Having thus announced this generous and selfsacrificing determination, which shows that Perry had not wantonly outraged either the service or one of its officers, since he was willing to expiate his fault by the exposure of his life without an effort at self-defence, the affair remained for some time in this position. So much publicity was given to the contemplated meeting by the opposite party, that there was great difficulty in bringing it about. The civil authorities were everywhere on the alert, and letters poured in from all sides from the friends of Perry, counselling him against the meeting; some by touching appeals based upon moral and religious considerations; others by arguing against the claim of his opponent, on the score of his having refused to admit of a private accommodation, and determined "to rely upon the laws of his country for justice." In a letter of the third of April we find him writing to an anxious friend, "As regards this business with Heath, it has almost become farcical from the publicity which he and his partisans have given to it. This circumstance weighs more with me than any other. I do not wish to render myself ridiculous." Again, on the fourteenth of May, he writes to another friend, "The only difficulty now is, my adversary has rendered himself so contemptible in this quarter, I am at a loss how to act."

But on this very fourteenth of May, another "difficulty" that he dreamed not of was in store for him; and a fresh "adversary," learning that he was about to stand up to be shot at, prepared to step forward to destroy what might be left of him after Heath had finished. This "adversary," who had striven to injure him, but whom he had never injured, and whom he had earnestly exerted himself to prevent others from injuring, was Captain J. D. Elliott. It may be proper to go back to state, that, though Perry was made fully aware of the efforts which Captain Elliott had made to injure him immediately after he delivered up the command of the Lake Erie squadron to him, he had felt too secure of his own position to take any measures to expose Captain Elliott. He was willing, on every account, that the affair should remain in the position in which his ill-judged letter of the nineteenth of September had left it. That he was not ignorant of the intrigues of Captain Elliott is evident from the ample details on the subject contained in the letters from his friends at Erie, and from which the statements contained in the tenth chapter are taken. The following extract from a letter to Mr. Hambleton, dated on the eighth of April, 1815, shows that, at a later period, he suspected Captain Elliott of efforts to injure him by misrepresentations at Washington.

"I am not in much favour with the new secretary. I apprehend that some one has been endeavouring to injure me. If it is the person I suspect, I will no longer remain silent; but the officers who have given currency to the reports which have set this wretch against me must come forward and avow them."

This shows that Perry had well-founded reason to suspect an attempt to injure him; it shows, also, that he had generally abstained from any unfavourable remarks against Captain Elliott, and was displeased that his officers had not abstained, in like manner, in compliance with his injunctions.

In April, 1815, soon after the date of this letter, a court of inquiry, consisting of three members, was held in New-York for the purpose of investigating the losses of the President, Frolic, and Rattlesnake. Captain Elliott, being at that time in New-York, in command of the sloop Ontario, applied to the navy department to instruct this court to inquire into the conduct of the Niagara while under his command in the battle on Lake Erie, and whether the Niagara attempted to "make away," as stated in the finding of the British court-martial on Commodore Barclay. The secretary, immediately instructed the court, that it having been stated to him that, by the proceedings of a court of inquiry in Great Britain, the conduct of Captain Elliott had been "misrepresented," justice to the reputation of Captain Elliott and to the navy of the United States required that a true statement of the facts in relation to his conduct on that occasion should be exhibited to the world. The court was therefore directed to inquire into the same, ascertain the part he had sustained during the action, and report to the department. The court proceeded immediately to the examination of seven witnesses, five of whom belonged to the Niagara, while two of the Lawrence's officers were introduced to give a colour of impartiality to the transaction. The evidence of the minority was, of course, borne down, and the court came to the highly patriotic conclusion that, instead of the Niagara making away from the Queen Charlotte, the Queen Charlotte bore off from the fire of the Niagara. It gave no reason, however, why the Niagara did not follow her. The court was begun and ended with the utmost celerity. In the investigation of the case, neither the commanding officer on the occasion, nor any of the commanders of the smaller vessels, were summoned to give their evidence. Perry probably knew nothing of this investigation until it was over; and, had he known of it, his feelings at the time, as quoted in the letter of the eighth of April, would have made him reluctant to appear against Captain Elliott, however unfavourable his opinions with regard to him. Captain Elliott had remained in undisturbed possession of all the benefit he could derive from Captain Perry's official letter of the thirteenth of September, from his friendly certificate of the nineteenth, and from the patriotic findings of the court of inquiry, down to the time of Perry's becoming involved in his troubles with Heath, the target for the public press to aim its shafts at, and about to become a target for the pistol of Captain Heath. At this conjuncture, on the same day that he wrote to Hambleton about the difficulty in meeting his first adversary, Captain Elliott despatched the following missive to him, which, to prevent mistakes, is printed verbatim from the original.<sup>1</sup>

Communications which have recently been made me and exact copies of which, I herewith enclose you renders it necessary that I should hear from you immediately, as soon as I heard of your late visit to Washington, I lost not a moment in hurrying off from this place with a hope that we should meet and settle those differences which have so long existed, your sudden, and to me, unexpected departure from that City prevented the contemplated meeting, and my orders to sit on a Court Martial in Baltimore which detained me from this place longer than I at first expected has induced me to return to Virginia, and instead of the personal interview which had alone carried me from home and which I had so anxiously hoped for would take place; now compels me to address you through the medium of a Letter. I could most sincerely wish that my wounded feelings did not compel me to address you at a moment when it might seem, if prompted; by the late public investigation of your Mediterranean command. The wrongs which I have suffered, are many; and after taking a retrospect of all the transactions connected with our affairs which have been made public, I am, at a loss to know how it was possible you could have made such representations as contained in the certificates herewith enclosed, Immediately after the action on Lake Erie you must recollect that reports prejudicial to my character were put in circulation, when I called on you for a written contradiction of them, (your answer I presume is in your possession) you say in your letter you have no fault to find of myself officers and cru [sic] complement me by saying you are indebted in a great measure for the victory; "my bringing the small vessels into close action" and conclude with a positive assertion that "the Niagara would from her superior order have taken the Queen Charlotte in 20 minutes had she not made sail and engaged the Lawrence," what Sir has since occurred to draw from you such base false and malicious reports as contained in the certificates enclosed. I will conclude my remarks with one or two observations and permit you to draw such inferences as your feelings of honor may dictate, hoping that you will never again have occasion either in the society of the Ladies or that of young Navy Officers to make use of expressions of a similar nature and which too intended to my injury, pray Sir has your memory been so treacherous as to fail recollecting our interview at Erie and that you then said if "I would not dwell on the action" "that you would write a private Letter to the Honb. Scty of the Navy and express your surprise that the Country did not give me half the honors of the victory"

With proper Respect
J. D. Elliott

O. H. Perry Esqr

"Norfolk, February 2, 1818.

"Sir,

"In conversation with some of the officers of the U. S. ship Washington, your name was mentioned in connexion with the action on Lake Erie, when Lieutenant W .B. Shubrick observed, that Captain Perry had publicly said your reputation was in his hands, and that the least you and your friends can say on the subject of that action, the better for you.

"I at the same time said I was your friend, and, as soon as an opportunity presented, would make known to you the assertion which is now communicated.

"W. H. Breckenridge."

"To Captain Jesse D. Elliott."

"Washington, February 27, 1818.

"Sir,

"You having called on me for some assertions made by Captain Perry, I can only state, that some time in the year 1813 I saw Commodore Perry in New-York, and mentioned I had received a letter from Captain Elliott respecting the engagement on Lake Erie.

"Commodore Perry replied, that Captain Elliott had better be quiet on that subject; that he had understood other letters had been written by him to his friends.

"The above conversation between Commodore Perry and myself has never been, directly or indirectly, mentioned by me to Captain Elliott until called upon by him here.

"John Hall."

"It is with the deepest regret that the friends of merit observe how much you have been overlooked in the late engagement on Lake Erie. You are bound, in justice to yourself, to lay before your country and the world your own share of the glory of that day. You may rest assured that Perry is endeavouring to rob you of all. I have a correspondent who resides in Newport, and who heard Perry say, in a private circle, when he was representing the action, that when he went on board the Niagara, he found you pale and trembling like an aspen-leaf, and all your officers, and that it was with difficulty he could get you to obey his commands. Although I have not the honour of your acquaintance, I feel bound, by my attachment to worth and gallantry, to give you this information, trusting to your honour as a gentleman and officer not to betray me; for my friends would highly condemn a step of the kind, and Perry, too, knows my handwriting. But I feel confident you will confine this information to your own breast; it is only for your benefit that I give it.

"It would afford me much pleasure to know that you have received this in safety. If you wish to acknowledge the receipt, direct to 'Miss Mary G. R Russell, Petersburg, Virginia.'"

Captain Perry's reply to Captain Elliott.

Newport, Rhode Island, June 18, 1818.

"Sir,

"The letter which I have lately received from you has evidently been written for the purpose of being exhibited to your friends, and in the hope that, passing without reply, it might gain credit among those upon whom you have been long in the habit of practising similar impositions. You had much reason, sir, to indulge in such a hope.

"It is humiliating to be under the necessity of replying to any letter written by a person who so little knows what becomes a gentleman. I must not, however, permit you to derive from my silence any countenance to the gross falsehoods contained in your letter, and which it would be an affectation of decorum to call by any other name; such, particularly, is the absurd declaration you impute to me in the close of it, and the perverted account you give of the manner in which I was once induced to write a letter in your favour. How imprudent, as well as base, is it in you, by such misrepresentations, to reduce me to the necessity of reminding you of the abject condition in which I had previously found you, and by which I was moved to afford you all the countenance in my power; sick, or pretending to be sick, in bed, in consequence of distress of mind, declaring that you had missed the fairest opportunity of distinguishing yourself that ever man had, and lamenting so piteously the loss of your reputation, that I was prompted to make almost any effort to relieve you from the shame which seemed to overwhelm you? This, you very well know, was the origin of the certificate I then granted you; and that your letter to me, of which you once furnished a false copy for publication, and which you now represent as making a demand upon me, was merely an introduction to mine. Another motive I had, which you could not appreciate, but which I urged with success on the other officers: it resulted from a strong, and, I then hoped, pardonable desire, that the public eye might only rest upon the gallant conduct of the fleet, and not be attracted to its blemishes, as I feared it would be by the irritation excited by your conduct among the officers and men, most of whom, I hoped, had acquired sufficient honour to gratify their ambition, even should that honour be shared by some one who might less deserve it.

"The expressions stated in your two certificates to have been made use of by me, when speaking of your unmanly conduct, were probably the most lenient I have for a long time employed when called upon to express my opinion of you; and thoroughly known as, you must be conscious, your character is to me, it was quite needless for you to have procured certificates of the contempt with which I have spoken of you. You might readily, however, have furnished much more ample ones, and of a much earlier date, than those it has suited you to produce; for you allowed but little time to elapse, after receiving the benefits of my letter, before your falsehoods and intrigues against me made me fully sensible of the error I had committed in endeavouring to prop so unprincipled a character.

"If it be really true that you hurried to Washington for the purpose of inviting me to a meeting, it is indeed unfortunate that intentions for which you give yourself so great credit have evaporated in a pitiful letter, which none but a base and vulgar mind could have dictated. The reputation you have lost is not to be recovered by such artifices; it was tarnished by your own behaviour on Lake Erie, and has constantly been rendered more desperate by your subsequent folly and habitual falsehood. You cannot wonder at the loss: that reputation which has neither honour, nor truth, nor courage for its basis must ever be of short duration. Mean and despicable as you have proved yourself to be, I shall never cease to criminate myself for having deviated from the path of strict propriety, for the sake of screening you from public contempt and indignation. For this offence to the community I will atone, in due time, by a full disclosure of your disgraceful conduct. But that you, of all men, should exultingly charge me with an error committed in your favour, and by which you were (as far as a man in your situation could be) saved from disgrace, is a degree of turpitude of which I had before no conception.

"O. H. Perry."

Sir

Your Letter of the 19th June is before me, having been received this moment on my return after several days absence from this state on public business. I have read it Sir with attention, and will do you the justice in 'saying' it is a masterly production of Epistolary blackguardism; I had hoped my last letter, would have drawn from you some other reply more honourable; and I am now induced to give you that invitation which I supposed my letter would have drawn from you, in case the certificates inclosed were true. I now invite you to the field appoint your time and place some where equal distant from us both, giving me only a reasonable time to join you, after the receipt of your answer when nothing in the power of human controul shall detain me, It might be expected I should answer this vocabulary of false and vulgar assertions of yours in detail, I cannot descent to such blackguardism; Declamations such as contained in the Letter in question can be productive of little benefit towards a final settlement of the present dispute—and I feel no disposition to procrastinate this business by useles waste of Ink and paper. I must resort to some other weapon more potent than a ' pen" one which will place me at once above your cunning and teach you that all your former low and ungentlemenly acts shall not shield you from the chastise ment you merit. Tho your memory appears a most treacherous one, and tho I have the most horred opinion of your general character, still I cannot think you, so base, so lost, to all sense of justice and feeling, as to have forgotten the manner in which you presented yourself to me on board the Niagara in the action on Lake Erie, the words then made use of, as well as the friendly congratulations I received from you on my return to my own vessel after the battle; I do not pretend to select any particular place for our meeting, tho I would recommend a sentral situation a place in which we might be strangers, by doing so the object of our meeting would excite no suspisions, and throw no new difficulty in the way; you shall be made acquainted with the name of my friend, as soon as I hear from you, till then as little writing as possible; Public business will call me from this place on the 1st next month, I should like to receive you final answer before that time if possible, a duplicate of this will be forwarded a similar reply if you please, and seal with some other seal than the one on your last bearing the enitial of you name<sup>2</sup>

To

O. H. Perry Esqr.
New Port

July 7th 1818

"Newport, Aug. 3d, 1818.

"Sir,

"Your letter of the 7th ult. was delivered to me on my return to this place from New-York. It is impossible that you should not have anticipated the reply the invitation it contains would at this time receive, having before you my letter of the eighteenth June last, in which I implicitly gave you to understand what course I should pursue in regard to you. Most men, situated as you are, and avowing their innocence, would have considered their honour best defended against the charges contained in that letter by first demanding the investigation announced to you, and holding me accountable on failure to support them.

"I have prepared the charges I am about to prefer against you; and, by the mail to-morrow, shall transmit them to the secretary of the navy, with a request that a court-martial be instituted for your trial upon them.

"Should you be able to exculpate yourself from these charges, you will then have a right to assume the tone of a gentleman; and, whatever my opinion of you may be, I shall not have the least disposition to dispute that right, in respect to any claim you may then think proper to make upon me.

"I am, sir, your humble servant,
"O. H. Perry."

"Captain J. D. Elliott, U. S. Navy, Norfolk."

The charges which Captain Perry had promised to forward on the day succeeding that on which the foregoing letter was written, he was prevented from completing until several days later; they were then transmitted to Washington with the following letter:

"The HON. BENJAMIN W. CROWNINSHIELD, Secretary of the Navy Department.

"Sir,

"I have the honour to lay before you copies of a letter lately received by me from Captain Jesse D. Elliott, of the Navy, and of certain certificates enclosed therein, with copies also of my letter in reply, and of the affidavits of Lieutenants Turner, Stevens, and Champlin, and Dr. Parsons.

"The conduct of Captain Elliott, partially presented to view in these papers, and still more clearly marked by other acts of that officer within my knowledge, and fully susceptible of proof, imposes upon me the duty of preferring- against him the charges which accompany this letter; and I now accordingly do prefer such charges against Captain Elliott, and request that a court-martial may be ordered for his trial thereupon.

"The facts upon which some of these charges are founded, particularly those relating to the behaviour of that officer during the engagement on Lake Erie, having been long in my possession, you will expect me to account for my not having sooner made them known to the government, and for having mentioned favourably, in my official report of that action, an officer whose conduct had been so reprehensible.

"At the moment of writing that report, I did, in my own mind, avoid coming to any conclusion to what cause the conduct of Captain Elliott was to be imputed; nor was I then fully acquainted with all the circumstances relating to it. Having, previously to the engagement, given all the orders which I thought necessary to enable every officer to do his duty, and feeling confidence in them all, I was, after it commenced, necessarily too much engaged in the actual scene before me to reflect deliberately upon the cause which could induce Captain Elliott to keep his vessel so distant both- from me and the enemy. And, after the battle was won, I felt no disposition rigidly to examine into the conduct of any of the officers of the fleet; and, strange as the behaviour of Captain Elliott had been, yet I would not allow myself to come to a decided opinion, that an officer who had so handsomely conducted himself on a former occasion, as I then, in common with the public, had been led to suppose Captain Elliott had, could possibly be guilty of cowardice or treachery. The subsequent conduct also of Captain Elliott; the readiness with which he undertook the most minute services; the unfortunate situation in which he now stood, which he lamented to me, and his marked endeavours to conciliate protection, were calculated to have their effect. But, still more than all, I was actuated by a strong desire that, in the fleet I then had the honour to command, there should be nothing but harmony after the victory had been gained, and that nothing should transpire which would bring reproach upon any part of it, or convert into crimination the praises to which it was entitled, and which I wished all to share and enjoy. The difficulties produced in my mind by these considerations were, at the time, fully expressed to an officer of the fleet, in whom I had great confidence. If I omitted to name Captain Elliott, or named him without credit, I might not only ruin that officer, but, at the same time, give occasion to animadversions which, at that period, I thought would be little to the honour or advantage of the service. If my official report of that transaction is reverted to, these embarrassments with respect to Captain Elliott, under which I laboured in drawing it, will, I believe, be apparent. That report was very different from what had been expected by the officers of the fleet; but, having adopted the course which I thought most prudent to pursue with regard to Captain Elliott, I entreated them to acquiesce in it, and made every exertion in my power to prevent any farther remarks on his conduct, and even furnished him with a favourable letter or certificate for the same purpose, of which he has since made a very unjustifiable use.

"These sir, are the reasons which induced me at the time not to bring on an inquiry into his conduct. The cause and propriety of my now doing so will, I trust, require but a few explanations. I would willingly, for my own sake as well as his, after the course I had pursued for the purpose of shielding him, have still remained silent; but this Captain Elliott will not allow me to do. He has acted upon the idea that, by assailing my character, he shall repair his own.

"After he was left in the command at Lake Erie, I was soon informed of the intrigues he was there practising, some of which are detailed in these charges. These I should not have regarded as long as they were private; but I then determined, and declared to many of my friends in the navy, that, should Captain Elliott ever give publicity to his misrepresentations, I would then demand an investigation of the whole of his conduct. This necessity is now forced upon me.

"Believing my hands to be bound, and even braving me with the very certificate afforded to him in charity, this officer at last addresses directly to myself, and claims my acquiescence in the grossest misrepresentations, not only of his own conduct on Lake Erie, but of conduct and declarations which he imputes to me.

"Thus has Captain Elliott himself brought his conduct on Lake Erie again into view, and, by involving with it imputations upon mine, has compelled me to call for this inquiry. He can make no complaint, therefore, of delay in bringing forward any of these charges. Those which regard his conduct on Lake Erie, and his justification, if he has any, are, besides, as perfectly susceptible of proof now as at any earlier period. Whatever the character of that behaviour was, it was witnessed by such numbers as to leave nothing in it equivocal or unexplained. Some of the officers who were with him may still be called upon, and although two or three others are deceased, yet so were they when Captain Elliott himself called for a court of inquiry. Certificates also were obtained from those officers by Captain Elliott while living, the originals of which are in the Department, and it may be seen by them that those officers, if present, would have no testimony to give which could at all militate with these charges. There are many officers deceased from whose testimony Captain Elliott would have much more to fear than he would have to hope from that of the officers above alluded to. A court of inquiry, consisting of three officers, was once called at the request of Captain Elliott, in consequence, if I recollect rightly, of some allusions to the conduct of the Niagara, supposed to be contained in the British Commodore Barclay's report; and though that inquiry, of which no notice to attend as witnesses was given to any of the commanders of vessels on Lake Erie, could only be a very limited one, and could involve no actual trial upon Captain Elliott's conduct, yet he undoubtedly had before that court all such witnesses as could testify in his favour, and the record of that testimony, if any of those witnesses are deceased, will avail him. Captain Elliott, therefore, can suffer nothing from the lapse of time; and it would, indeed, be a strange pretension in him to claim protection from inquiry into his conduct, at the same time that he is giving notoriety to his own representations of it, and that, too, to the prejudice of others.

"I am, sir, fully sensible how troublesome the frequent examination into the conduct of officers has been to the government, and how disagreeable they must have become. I am aware, also, that the public are justly dissatisfied with them, and that reproach has been brought upon the service by means of them. I have, therefore, avoided asking for this investigation as long as I possibly could do so with any justice to the service or to my own character.

"I have the honour to be, sir,
"Your most obedient servant,
"O. H. Perry."

"Newport, August 10th, 1818."

Sir

Two months having elapsed since the date of your answer to my invitation for the field and as I have neither been furnished with an arrest or made acquainted with the charge you state would be forwarded to the proper authority by the following mail I have hastened from Falls River to the Honb. Secretary of the Navy's quarters and by him have been informed that he has not heard from you for the last two months nor does he know of any transaction between us, I am yet under the impression that you are disposed to continue your old schemes of deception. I must therefore again call your attention to my former communication with a request that you will answer me by return of mail or by sea as I shall leave here for the south in five days.

With propr Respect

J. D. Elliott

O. H. Perry Esqr.
Boston 3rd Octo 1818
Newport R I.

Newport, October 6, 1818.

"Sir,

"In reply to your letter of the third instant, I have to inform you, that I forwarded to the Navy Department, on the tenth of August last, charges which I then preferred against you. It is not for me to account for their not having been submitted to the honourable the secretary of the navy. I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"O. H. Perry."

"Captain Jesse D. Elliott, U. S. N."

The following letter from the acting secretary of the navy, who, as chief clerk, attended to the duties of the office in the frequent absences of the secretary, accounts for the ignorance of that functionary with regard to the charges.

Navy Department, October 5, 1818.

"Sir,

"In reply to your letter of the twenty-ninth ultimo, I have the honour to inform you that your communication of the tenth of August last, with the enclosures, were duly received.

"The importance of the subject induced me to transmit all the papers to the President of the United States, conformably to his instructions to lay all matters before him involving the question of court-martial. I have not received the president's decision thereon, which is daily expected. I shall remind him of the subject, and give you the earliest information of the result.

"I am, respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

"Benjamin Homans."

Commanding Naval Officer, Newport."

The motives of the president in suspending all action on this subject were the same which influenced Perry, until he was thus assailed when surrounded by other difficulties: an unwillingness to reveal to the nation and the world so disgraceful a passage in our history as the conduct of the Niagara in the battle on Lake Erie. It will be seen from a letter, which will be hereafter quoted in its place, that Captain Elliott was not a little alarmed at the prospect of a court-martial, and complained that Perry had waited for the death of all his witnesses.

Whether Captains Elliott and Heath were acting in concert or not, can only be conjectured. While the former was despatching his last missive from Boston, the latter invaded the state with his second, striking terror into the minds of the peaceful and moral inhabitants; and though it is not recorded that Perry was much alarmed, conveying, doubtless, no trifling pang to the anxious bosom of his wife. The civil authorities, made aware of the warlike errand of these visitors, took them both into custody, and only discharged them after they had entered into recognizances to keep the peace and leave the territory of the state. Before, however, they had departed, Perry, who had held himself ready from the beginning of the year, when he first heard of Captain Heath's hostile intentions, to yield him the desired meeting whenever called upon to do so, made arrangements to meet Captain Heath in Washington. Being determined to put some limit of time to the duration of an annoyance so distressing to his friends and so cruelly destructive to the happiness of his domestic circle, he caused the following provision to be endorsed on the back of the agreement for regulating the terms of the meeting, signed by the friends of both parties: "Captain Perry desires it to be explicitly understood, that, in according to Captain Heath the personal satisfaction he has demanded, he is influenced entirely by a sense of what he considers due from him, as an atonement to the violated rules of the service, and not by any consideration of the claims which Captain Heath may have for making such a demand, which he totally denies; as such claims have been forfeited by the measures of a public character which Captain Heath has adopted towards him. If, therefore, the civil authority shall produce an impossibility of meeting at the time and place designated, which he will take every precaution to prevent, he will consider himself absolutely exonerated from any responsibility to Captain Heath touching their present cause of difference."

The tenth of October and the neighbourhood of Washington were the time and place originally fixed for the meeting; but Commodore Decatur having passed Perry on the road to Washington, whither he had gone with Major James Hamilton, of South Carolina, his schoolmate and constant friend, it became necessary for the parties to turn back towards New-York, where they met on the nineteenth of October, on the Jersey shore of the Hudson, above Hoboken, the scene of many a distressing tragedy. Perry was accompanied by Decatur and Major Hamilton; Heath by Lieutenant Desha, of the the marines. The principles were placed back to back. Perry's face was calm and unmoved, free from all traces of rancorous feeling, and only varied by a passing smile, and his whole bearing as far removed as possible from all betrayal of his being there present to expose his life without an effort to defend it. The seconds stood aside; the splendid figure of Decatur erected to its fullest stature, and his noble countenance more than usually calm and thoughtful. At the word, the antagonists advanced five paces with a measured step, regulated by the voice of one of the seconds, then wheeled, Heath discharging his pistol towards Perry, and Perry abstaining from firing. Decatur now stepped forward and declared that Commodore Perry had come to the ground with the fixed determination to receive without returning the fire of Captain Heath, in evidence of which he read the letter which months before had been addressed to him. Decatur then observed that he presumed the party claiming to be aggrieved was satisfied. Captain Heath acquiesced, through his friend, in this opinion, and admitted that his injury was atoned for. So ended this affair, of which, without entering into the immorality of duelling, or the evils of a custom which soon after deprived us of Decatur, we will merely say, that the rencounter on Perry's part wanted so far the character of a duel, that, though he exposed his own life, he did not jeopardize that of his antagonist. His conduct in this particular was generous in the extreme. If he had given a blow, it had, like other blows given in passion, been provoked by an insult, which in so far placed them on an equality; he would have been justified by precedent in meeting his opponent on an equal footing. His failing to aim at his antagonist, while he allowed himself to be aimed at, was as magnanimous as it was unusual.

ONE more winter of domestic tranquillity, of happiness unalloyed, remained for Perry. The difficulty with Heath thus terminated to the satisfaction of the marine corps, the press, and the public; the difficulty with Captain Elliott set at rest by those charges which Perry was at any moment ready to substantiate, but which the president was disinclined to bring before the public, and Captain Elliott was, as Perry was assured, too happy to permit to sleep, Perry now devoted himself, heart and soul, to the quiet enjoyment of his home. Some time before, he had built a snug little cottage in Narragansett, on the farm which had been settled at the first colonization of the country by Edmund Perry, where five generations of his ancestors had lived in the practice of virtue, and where their remains lay entombed. Thither he retired to pass a portion of the summer and autumn; there he kept his only dumb pets, his little family of thorough-bred colts, which furnished him with the means of his favourite amusement. In the winter of 1818 and 1819 he made farther provision for being permanently comfortable, by the advantageous purchase of an excellent house in town, situated on the parade. Most of his little means, the well-earned spoil of his own arm, were thus invested, but the emoluments of his office were ample for his support in a community where extravagance and ostentation were unknown. In possession, after every trifling abatement, of the rapturous admiration of his countrymen, with a good collection of books of his own, and an excellent public library quite near at hand; surrounded by intelligent, admiring, and deeply-attached friends, with the happiest and tenderest endearments twining round his heart, drawing their nourishment from it and nourishing it, in excellent health, scarcely yet entered in the prime of life, he, if any one, might well be excused in hugging himself with rapture, and exclaiming, not without thankfulness, "Soul! thou hast much good laid up for many years; take thine ease!"

On the thirtieth of March, 1819, he resumed his correspondence with Mr. Hambleton, after one of those customary interruptions to which his extreme aversion to the pen rendered him liable, and which, almost every time he wrote, made an apology necessary. "You are perfectly aware," he goes on to say, "of my indolence in writing; and there is no doubt I have offended many persons who were very favourably disposed towards me by neglecting to answer their letters. Those who know me will make allowances. You are to believe anything rather than a diminution of my affectionate respect. I have really no fixed plan as regards public employment, but am, as Cathcart says, 'on the surface of occasion.' If I am ordered abroad, I will go cheerfully; but I will not solicit anything from the government. They know, better, probably, than I do to what I am entitled, and they must determine. I will not submit to the mortification of a refusal. I hope, however, that the Department is not now under the influence of intrigue, but that every one will receive his due. I have purchased a house in town, which I am fitting up for my family, and shall probably get into it next month. It is said to be a good purchase, and is situated on the south side of the parade. It contains twelve good rooms besides the kitchens, and has a large garden. It cost four thousand four hundred dollars, and will require about one thousand more to put it in such order as to please me. Mrs. Perry often inquires after you, and there is no one, I assure you, who takes a greater interest in all your concerns. We cherish the hope that you will, if not ordered away, make us a visit this summer. I have three fine boys to introduce to you." This is the last letter from Perry to Mr. Hambleton. The close of that summer he was not destined to see. Before it was over, there was an end of his hopes, his endearments, his annoyances.

On the day after writing his last letter to Mr. Hambleton, Perry received the following from Mr. Smith Thompson, the distinguished and respectable secretary of the navy, dated at New-York on the twenty-ninth of March.

"Sir,

"We have some very important and confidential business which the president wishes to commit to some of our distinguished navy officers, and has mentioned you as one he is desirous of intrusting with it. The business is of such a nature, and the arrangements necessary to be made to carry it into effect require that I should have a personal interview with you. I wish, therefore, you would repair to this place as soon as you conveniently can. Be pleased to drop me a line immediately on the receipt of this, and let me know when you will be here, that I may make it a point to be at home.

"I am, sir, very respectfully,

"Your most obedient servant,

"Smith Thompson."

"Commodore Perry."

On repairing to New-York, Perry was confidentially informed of the nature of the service on which it was desired to employ him. The alarming extent to which depredations on the commerce of the world were at that time carried by adventurers of all nations, using the flags of the new states of South America, in vessels fitted out ostensibly to cruise against the ships of Spain, but extending their predatory visitations to the ships of other countries, and passing, with great facility and in very many cases, from the character of privateers to that of pirates, must still be well remembered by many. The Republics of Buenos Ayres and Venezuela had given most encouragement to these predatory enterprises; they had issued commissions for privateers, without limit or qualification, to adventurers who thronged from all parts of the world to their ports, which they enriched by an influx of spoil.

The question, too, of blockade, which has been an instrument of plunder in the hands of the most powerful nations, was turned by these rising nations to the same unprincipled uses. Our commerce extended over the world, and, especially in the South American seas, had suffered most severely. The government had determined to put an end to a system which could no longer be endured. But, in effecting this desirable object, it was desirous of not wounding or giving offence to nations whose outset in their career the United States had been the first to hail and recognize, and whose friendship they were desirous of cultivating. To put down a practice which, in interest and honour, we could no longer tolerate, without creating enemies, was a task of no trifling delicacy, requiring in the agent judgment, energy and discretion. It was this duty that Mr. Thompson was now desirous of intrusting to Captain Perry. Such force as he might deem necessary was to be placed at his disposal, and he was to go out in a diplomatic as well as in a military character, receiving extra compensation for his diplomatic services from the department of state, under whose orders he was to be placed for that portion of his duties. Strong as were the ties that bound Perry to his home, and acutely sensible as he was to their force, he could not, as a servant of the public, decline a task of importance' thus flatteringly tendered to him at the special instance of the president. He at once accepted it, and returned to his home, briefly to prepare for his departure, and to linger to the latest moment within the circle of its endearments.

It had been arranged that the Constellation frigate should bear his flag; but, as it would require some time to prepare her for sea, and the government was anxious for the immediate commencement of his mission, the sloop John Adams, being ready, was ordered to receive him temporarily, and the Constellation was to follow with the least possible delay. Having allowed him to remain until the latest moment at Newport, Mr. Thompson informed him, on the tenth of May that the John Adams was daily expected at Annapolis for his reception, and would be ready for sea by the time he could repair to Washington and receive the instructions of Mr. Adams, the secretary of state, and reach her. Tearing himself from the home which he was never to revisit, he proceeded to Washington. There he learned that it would be necessary to visit Angostura, more than three hundred miles up the Orinoco; and, as the John Adams would be unable to pass the bar at the mouth of the river, over which there is only sixteen feet water, he wrote to the secretary, then at

New-York, to suggest the expediency of accompanying the John Adams by a vessel of lighter draught. By return of mail, the schooner Nonsuch was placed at his disposal for this service. Perry now received his instructions in full from Mr. Secretary Adams, setting forth, with the thorough acquaintance with the whole history of his times for which he is so distinguished, the friendly course which the United States had pursued towards the republics of South America, our doctrine with regard to blockades and the equipment of privateers, and giving ample instructions for the government of the commander in the various contingencies in which he might be placed.

While in Washington he passed much of his time in the congenial society of his true friend, Decatur, of whom he frequently speaks in his correspondence in terms of strong attachment and the most exalted admiration. Decatur afterward called to mind that Perry mentioned to him, at parting, the possibility of their not meeting again. He remarked that, from what he knew of his own constitution, and his inability to bear active remedies of any sort, he felt persuaded that, should he be attacked with yellow fever in the Orinoco, he could not recover.

On the fifth of June he arrived at Annapolis and visited the John Adams, on which occasion his broad pendant was hoisted under a salute of thirteen guns. He found the ship, as he remarks, in good order, under the command of Captain Alexander S. Wadsworth. He was, however, compelled immediately to relinquish the services and society of this accomplished officer, who left the ship on the following day to take command of the Constellation, which he was to fit for sea and bring out to him, and then resume the command of his own ship. For first lieutenant he had, however, his staunch and devoted follower and affectionate friend, Lieutenant Daniel Turner, and Mr. C. O. Handy, his former secretary and attached friend, had been ordered to the ship as purser. He remarks, with evident satisfaction, in the note-book in which he set down with pen or pencil whatever occurred to him, whether a passage of a favourite author or some passing remark, that the officers were gentlemen-like-looking young men, and the crew a tolerably good one. While waiting at Annapolis for the arrival of the purser with money and stores, and for the Nonsuch to join company from Baltimore,

Commodore Perry addressed a letter to his intimate friend and relative, Mr. B. Hazard, of Newport, from which the following is extracted, as interesting in itself, or illustrative of what has gone before:

"I must content myself with giving you a very brief letter, with some little account of myself. Without feeling at liberty to mention where I am going, or upon what service, I can assure you it is perfectly satisfactory to me. The course which has been observed towards me by the different officers of government with whom I have had occasion to communicate has been extremely gratifying. My wishes have been, as far as possible, anticipated; and, whatever I have suggested, immediately assented to. I go out as commodore, and am to have several vessels under my orders.

"I wish you to direct Benjamin Mason to make out a copy of the papers relative to Elliott, and forward them to Decatur. He is truly and sincerely a friend of mine, and one who is able and willing to tender me a service. He informs me Elliott was very industrious in Washington last winter, besieging members of Congress, changing his lodgings frequently, and using other such arts. Upon some he made impressions unfavourable to me; others had sense enough to discover his intrigues. Decatur had a long conversation with the president, who was extremely desirous of adjusting the difference, and even asked whether his mediation could possibly effect it. Decatur assured him a reconciliation was wholly out of the question. The president has great objections to having the business brought before the public, and it is probable the charges will sleep on the desk of the secretary. It is very certain they all understand Elliott now. He was, I am told, very much alarmed at the prospect of a trial; complained that I had waited until all his witnesses were dead; boasted of having challenged me several times; of having gained the battle; and told so many and contradictory stories, that he has effectually established his reputation for falsehood.

"You see what an egotist I am; every word of these pages about myself. I nevertheless think frequently of my friends in Newport, and the many comforts I have left behind me. I look forward to my return already with impatience, and shall hasten that period as much as is in my power. Possibly I may have the pleasure of seeing you in December. Mention me kindly to all my friends of the club, particularly to Randolph, Ellery, and Gibbs."

At Annapolis Perry was joined by Mr. B. Irvine, who had recently returned from Venezuela, to which he had been accredited as a confidential agent. From this highly intelligent gentleman, who met him by direction of the secretary of state, he received a great deal of useful information with regard to the political condition of Venezuela, and the character of the prominent personages in the government with whom he was likely to be brought into contact.

The purser having arrived on the night of the sixth with the specie, the John Adams weighed on the following morning, and stood down the bay as far as Poplar Island, where, the wind failing and the flood-tide coming in, she anchored. Being joined during the night by the Nonsuch, Lieutenant commanding Alexander Claxton, both vessels proceeded seaward on the eighth until off the entrance to James's River, when the Nonsuch was sent to Norfolk, with the purser and surgeon of the John Adams, to procure supplies, and the John Adams continued on to Lynnhaven Bay. Being detained by head winds and calms, the two vessels only got to sea on the eleventh of June, when the course was shaped for the passage between St. Thomas and Porto Rico. On the fifth of July they arrived off Barbadoes, when the commodore sent the Nonsuch in with Mr. Handy, to procure information with regard to the political condition of the Spanish Main, and to other subjects interesting to his movements. The Nonsuch returned on the following day with the required information, and abundant supplies of refreshments.

Lieutenant Claxton found Admiral Campbell commanding on the station at Barbadoes. After saluting his flag, he waited on him, when the admiral desired him to express his regret to the commodore that he should have been denied the opportunity of showing him all the civility which he wished, but hoped yet to have the pleasure of meeting him. From the admiral Mr. Claxton obtained some information the commodore was anxious for with regard to the hurricanes, of which the season was at hand. Their approach is denoted by the wind hauling to the south and west, attended with dark weather. Great apprehension was entertained of them that particular season, by reason of the uncommon absence of thunder and lightning; and the first hurricane was daily expected. It was mentioned as a remarkable and important fact, that they were never known to blow beyond two degrees southward of Barbadoes. The admiral was about to proceed in that direction to avoid them. Mr. Handy learned on shore that the contending armies on the Spanish Main had gone into summer quarters: Murillo, the Spanish general, at Apures, and Bolivar in his immediate neighbourhood. The expedition fitting at Margarita against Cumana, from which great results had been expected in favour of the Patriot cause, had not yet got in motion. Mr. Handy was unable to procure a good chart of the Orinoco, which the commodore had been unable to obtain in the United States. He brought word, however, that the navigation of the Gulf of Paria was free from danger, and that Port Spain, in the island of Trinidad, where the commodore proposed leaving the John Adams, was a noble harbour.

Proceeding on their course, the two vessels arrived, on the fifteenth of July, at the entrance of the Orinoco, when the commodore shifted his flag to the Nonsuch, and ordered the John Adams to Port Spain, distant about a hundred and fifty miles, to await his return. Having received a pilot outside the bar, the Nonsuch crossed and commenced the tedious ascent of the river, having more than three hundred miles to run against the current. For a considerable distance the immediate shores were uninhabited, owing to their extreme lowness, and the periodical rise of the river subjecting them to inundation. They were covered, however, with noble trees, the magnificent productions of tropical vegetation, to which the schooner, when the wind failed, was occasionally made fast with a light tow-line, and sheered with the helm to keep her clear of the shore. In ascending farther, occasional settlements occurred, and the vast forests were alternated by plantations, in which the rich soil and fertilizing sun amply repaid the toils of the cultivator. The scenery was everywhere grand and majestic, and often beautiful; but the excessive heat, the annoyance of the moschetoës, and the discomfort of so small a vessel, unfitted the commodore to enjoy it. Frequently, when the wind was light, he would get into his boat, and pull ahead of the schooner along the bank which she was following, amusing himself with his gun in bringing down the birds and other game which abounded in the overhanging trees. The nature of the shore, in many places, rendered landing impossible. In the following entry in a note-book, in which Perry recorded some of the circumstances attending his visit to Angostura, he forcibly describes the serious discomforts by which he was surrounded: "Confined on board a small vessel. Rise in the morning after being exhausted by heat. The sun, as soon as it shows itself, striking almost through one; moschetoos, sandflies, and gnats covering you. As the sun gets up, it becomes entirely calm, and its rays pour down a heat that is insufferable. The fever it creates, together with the irritation caused by the insects, produce a thirst which is insatiable; to quench which, we drink water at eighty-two degrees. About four o'clock, a rain squall, accompanied by a little wind, generally takes place. It might be supposed that this would cool the air; but not so. The steam which rises as soon as the sun comes out, makes the heat still more intolerable. At length night approaches; the wind leaves us. We go close in shore and anchor; myriads of moschetoos and gnats come off to the vessels, and compel us to sit over strong smokes created by burning oakum and tar, rather than endure their terrible stings. Wearied and exhausted, we go to bed to endure new torments. Shut up in the berth of a small cabin, if there is any air stirring, not a breath of it can reach us. The moschetoos, more persevering, follow us, and annoy us the whole night by their noise and bites, until, almost mad with the heat and pain, we rise to go through the same troubles the next day."

When about half way to Angostura they reached the village of Barancas, at that time the station of the Patriot flotilla operating on the river, consisting of four gunboats, the commander of which waited on the commodore as he passed. At length, on the evening of the twenty-sixth of July, the Nonsuch reached Angostura, and the commodore immediately despatched a lieutenant on shore to wait on the vice-president, Don Antofio Francisco Zea, the president, Bolivar, being then with the army, to announce his arrival, offer the customary salute, and ask when it would be convenient for the vice-president to see him. The vice-president expressed his satisfaction at the arrival at the Venezuelan capital of a public vessel of the United States bringing an officer of rank, promised that the salute should be returned gun for gun, and said that he would be happy to receive the commodore on the following morning at ten o'clock.

At nine the next day the Nonsuch saluted the Venezuelan flag, and her salute was duly returned. At ten the commodore landed, attended by several of his officers, and by Dr. Forsyth, an American gentleman resident in Angostura, formerly a surgeon in our army, and of whom Mr. Irvine had spoken to the commodore in the highest terms of approbation, and who served as interpreter in all the commodore's intercourse with the vice-president. They proceeded at once to the Government House, where they were received in the Hall of Congress by the vice-president. After the customary compliments, the commodore, in fulfillment of his instructions from Mr. Adams, informed the vice-president that he appeared, by order of his government, in the character only of a naval commander; that in that character he had been instructed to communicate with him, and would be glad to make known the object of his visit in the most informal manner. The vice-president replied that this mode would be extremely agreeable to him, and that he would be at any time ready to meet the commodore and be made acquainted with the object of his mission. The commodore then retired, and took up his residence with Dr. Forsyth, in compliance with his kind invitation. For the sequel of his visit we will now quote extensively from the note-book, in which he set down with pen or pencil the progress of his negotiation, and his occasional remarks on what was passing around him.

"The next day, being the twenty-eighth, I requested Mr. Forsyth to call on the vice-president, and know when I could be received for the purpose of opening my business. He replied that, to show his disposition to avoid ceremony, and his satisfaction at the mode I had adopted, he would call at my lodgings that evening, where we could have a free, friendly, and uninterrupted conversation, and avoid the curiosity of the people, who were much excited to learn the object of my mission. In the evening he called, as he had promised, when I explained to him fully the object of my visit to Venezuela; recapitulating, in the first place, the good offices which the United States had exerted to procure the recognition by Spain of the independence of her former colonies. While they had considered it their duty to observe a faithful and impartial neutrality, the part which they had taken, by negotiation with the European powers, had contributed more to promote the cause of South America than taking part against Spain would have done. Spain had solicited the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle to mediate between her and her colonies, they returning to their allegiance, and she granting to them certain commercial privileges heretofore withheld. The government of the United States was informed of this before the meeting of that Congress. It had been proposed that the United States should join in the mediation; but they refused to interfere in any plan of mediation except upon the basis of the complete independence of the colonies. This occasioned dissatisfaction to France and Russia. Great Britain, aware that the mediation could not be effected without the concurrence of the United States, stipulated that there should be no resort to force against South America. France and Russia assented; but proposed, should the accommodation be rejected, to prohibit all commercial intercourse with them, to which Great Britain objected. The last expedient proposed was, that the Duke of Wellington, in behalf of the Congress, should arrange with the cabinet of Madrid; the duke insisting, in any event, that force should not be used. Spain wished the perfect restoration of her colonies; but, finding it could not be obtained, declined all interposition on other terms. While our government always took occasion to manifest its good wishes, it never lost sight of the duty of neutrality, considering the war a civil one: South America wishing to gain her independence, Spain to maintain her supremacy. For the United States to have recognized either while the war still continued, would have been to take part. Hence their motive for refusing to have communication with Mr. Clemente, claiming to be received as the representative of Venezuela, while the war continued and her independence was incomplete. I then furnished Mr. Zea with the two acts of our Congress with regard to neutrality and piracy, and demanded indemnity for various spoliations, particularly the unjust seizure of American property by the schooner Brutus, commanded by Nicholas Joly, under the Amelia Island flag, which property had been condemned illegally, and sold within the territory of Venezuela. I also explained the views of the government with regard to privateers, and that commissions issued to them in blank were considered illegal. I asked also for an official list of those commissioned by Venezeula, that I might forward it to our government.

"The vice-president listened attentively, and appeared much gratified with the information I gave him with regard to the exertions of the United States, in behalf of South America, with the powers of Europe. His government knew that something unfavourable to South America liberty had been agitated by the allied powers, but of what nature they had hitherto been ignorant. Respecting Mr. Clemente, he said that the government of Venezuela was more displeased with him than the President of the United States could be; that his conduct was unauthorized, and a source of mortification to them; that the manner in which he had been treated was such as his improper conduct deserved; and that the note of Mr. Adams, stating the impossibility of having any communication with him, was couched in such delicate terms, that, even if there were any who had a disposition to be offended at it, it was impossible for them to be so with justice; that a gentleman of talent and great prudence had been expressly selected to go to the United States, and he trusted would conduct himself in such a manner as to afford no cause of complaint. On the other points he stated his disposition to do justice to those who had suffered from the aggressions of cruisers in the service of Venezuela. He stated that Congress was then engaged on the subject of their cruisers, and that laws would be passed to place them under rigorous restrictions. As soon as possible, I should be furnished with a copy of the laws and a list of the cruisers. With regard to the acts of Congress, he said that it was the duty of every government to bring to punishment those engaged in acts of piracy; but that, although no explanation was necessary on this subject, he received it as an act of friendship and delicacy on the part of the United States. He concluded by saying that he had no doubt I should receive entire satisfaction upon all the points I had mentioned, and that we should have the mutual pleasure of doing away the little difficulties that had existed between the two countries, when the most friendly relations, he hoped, would ensue.

"On Sunday, the first of August, I called on the vice-president, and handed him the notes which I had addressed to him, and entered again into explanations with him on the relations of the two governments. In this, as in the former interview, I received assurance of a prompt and favourable issue to my business. Yet, from the indolence of these people, I am not sanguine of an early termination of my visit; a visit which affords me no pleasure farther than a prospect of succeeding to the full extent of my wishes. The climate is bad, the town is extremely sickly. Already two Englishmen have been buried from the house in which I reside, and others are dying in different parts of the town daily. The officers and crew of the schooner begin to be sickly and anxious. For my own part, I meet this danger, as I do all others, simply because it is my duty; yet I must own there is something more appalling in the shape of death approaching in a fever than in the form of a cannon ball. The Creoles are also dying daily. I have nothing to do but wait patiently the time of the vice-president, and occasionally urge him to expedite my papers."

In the course of the week he adds,

"The vice-president assured me that, as it depended entirely on himself, an immediate and favourable answer would be given me; that indemnity for the vessels might be expected; and I should not be detained. Sickness taking place on board the schooner to an alarming degree, and a fever prevailing in the town of a malignant description, carrying off daily both natives and foreigners, I requested Mr. Forsyth to suggest to the vice-president that it would be very agreeable to me to depart. He appointed the Sunday following for an interview, and said he would be ready to communicate his answers. I waited on him on Sunday. He said the papers were ready, with the exception of the answer in relation to one of the claims; that he would write me a note the next morning; and wished, if possible, that I would consent to stay until the last of the week. I said, if there was any public business that required me to do so, I should consider it a duty to remain. I afterward discovered from Mr. Forsyth that it was only to give me a dinner. Monday I did not hear from the vice-president as he had promised; and the sickness of the crew increasing, the surgeon himself being attacked, and the time having already elapsed supposed by the secretary of state requisite to transact my business, I thought it advisable to write a note, signifying that I must depart.

"The communications I made to the vice-president appeared in the first instance to produce a favourable impression but at present he affects, as I am told, to think that the sole object of my visit is to reclaim the property that has been illegally captured. He joins others in the opinion that it will be policy to restore this property, as it will make a favourable impression on the minds of foreign nations. Yet it is a hard matter to make them disgorge their plunder. These people affect to think that it is very unkind in the United States to demand restitution of any property, however piratically obtained, if it has been done in the name of patriotism. The patriotism of these people is like the religion of Cromwell and his followers, who murdered, robbed, and committed every enormity 'in the name of the Lord.' Some difficulty may be anticipated in regulating their privateers by suitable restrictions, as people engaged in this business are the only moneyed men, and, of course, possess great influence. They will not readily give up so fruitful a source of revenue as the privilege of plundering at pleasure the peaceful commerce of all nations.

"I find a great degree of hostility exists here towards my government and country, and, notwithstanding the frank and friendly communications I have made to this government, no steps have been taken to do it away. The English are the favourites. This I should not mind if there had not been attempts to cast reflections on my government on the part of the British, and practise on the ignorant to our disadvantage. Paragraphs from the English papers injurious to the character of the United States, and boldly accusing them of hostility to South America, and having sold their neutrality to the Spanish government; are translated, printed in the paper under the direction of Doctor Rossio, the secretary of state, and pointed out to the people by the English merchants, who here, as elsewhere, consider the citizens of the United States as their natural rivals and enemies. Distrusting the warmth of my temper, I keep a strict guard upon myself; but I am really, at this moment, through their misrepresentations, looked upon almost as an enemy, merely because I have reclaimed property captured in the most illegal manner.

"The idea prevails generally among the people, and even among some men of intelligence, that the government of the United States is cold and indifferent to their fate; that it takes no interest in their struggle for independence. The ground of this belief is, that Britain having allowed men to be enlisted for them, and supplies furnished from its ports, while the Americans have furnished them with neither, they conclude that the English are much more favourable than the Americans to their cause. These feelings have been industriously fomented by the English who reside here. I have replied to this charge, that, having determined upon neutrality, whatever our feelings of partiality might be, we dealt fairly and honourably with both parties: truth and justice being the basis of all our acts, it would be inconsistent with our character to profess one thing and do another. Some of the most sensible of the inhabitants begin, however, to entertain jealousies of the English. They are alarmed at the readiness with which they come over, and are apprehensive that their government has some sinister views in giving sanction to the enlistment of men. They are aware that an English colony exists on their southern boundary, and many a short distance to the eastward. They recollect how very desirous England has been heretofore to obtain a footing on the continent, and they do not think so well of her as to suppose she would scruple to secure some valuable possessions if a favourable opportunity offers. Jealousies and dissensions have already arisen, and it does not require any great foresight to believe that they will become very serious. The English in their service have to suffer every privation from want of clothing and wholesome food. However well I may wish this cause, I cannot desire to see my countrymen suffer the privations and hardships which the English in this service have done: making campaigns in this climate without tents or anything to secure them from the burning sun; furnished regularly with neither pay or clothing; their only provisions miserable beef without salt, and occasionally a few plantains; held in little estimation by the natives, who, when they first arrive, envy them their fine coats, and afterward despise them for their inability to endure the climate. Many of the officers have returned sick from the army, with a shirt that could only endure being washed by a syringe, and a pair of pantaloons, the legs of which had retired to an alarming elevation. The troops would all desert if there were any secure refuge for them to escape to, and the officers resign if pride did not deter them.

"Having only stepped upon the threshold of the country, it scarcely becomes me to give an opinion as to its state. What little I have seen has, however, impressed me most unfavourably. There is scarcely a school or seminary of any kind in the country, and the children are growing up in gross ignorance; books are almost unknown, and the people generally debauched and depraved; gaming is prevalent with all classes; and generals and privates, whites and negroes, may be seen at the public gambling-houses engaged at the same table; chastity is little regarded, and looked on almost as an imaginary virtue, existing only in the minds of the passionless; married women and those of abandoned character visit and converse on a friendly footing. Religion is in the lowest state of degradation; forms are not attended to, and even superstition, has given place to disbelief in all Divine authority; liberty of the press is decreed, but nothing can be published without being submitted to the government. What, however, would be the result, should those in power, depraved as they are, be cut off? Who is to supply their place? Spanish policy has aimed at the entire extinction of talent and information among the natives. The blacks are numerous, and aware of their strength; great alarm exists in the minds of the few intelligent as to their future conduct and obedience. Should Bolivar and a few others be taken off, there will be an end to everything like government, even of a military despotism, for there are none to supply their place; and the country must inevitably fall into the hands of brigands, who will, by their robberies and murders, desolate the land, and by their piracies at sea form a nuisance to the commerce of the world."

This picture of the country, as it presented itself to Perry in a moment of irritation, created by the spectacle of vices shocking to his nice sense of morality, and the delays and vexations of a diplomacy which his impatient temper little fitted him to brook, was, though discouraging, doubtless, mainly, a true one. Nothing could have been more disastrous than the condition of this part of South America immediately after its premature revolution, for the sufficient causes which he assigns. The popular forms of government which succeeded to the jealous and narrow-minded colonial one must, however, be eventually productive of good. The education of the children of the wealthy and powerful in more enlightened lands, and, still more, the introduction of education at home, must eventually tend to the regeneration of those rich and fertile provinces, and prepare them, with the lapse of years, to be the seats of civilization, refinement, and a real liberty, of which, as yet, they have only the forms and name.

The note-book in which the remarks of Perry on the progress of his negotiation and his observations upon what was passing around him are found, contains other traces of his tastes, occupations, and the habits of his mind. These are brief sketches of the characters of the most considerable personages in Venezuela, founded on information obtained from conversation or the result of personal observation. Of Bolivar he says, "He is a man of education and considerable knowledge of the world, having travelled through Europe. He was possessed of a large fortune, which, combined with other qualifications, first gave him his ascendancy. He is fluent in conversation, speaks French, and understands English; is aristocratic in his views, believing the English constitution to be the best, and desirous of forming a government here on the same model; wishing to make an hereditary nobility among his general officers, who are represented as a set of profligates." General Paez he describes as "a man without education, originally a peasant, but possessing a strong mind and great heroism of character, united to military talent."

There is also in this book a list of trees, valuable plants, and animals peculiar to the country. Various extracts, too, denote the course of his reading at this time; in the Bible, Cicero, Vatel, American State Papers, Sir William Temple, Humboldt, and Madame de Staël. Extracts of these are often accompanied with opinions of his own. They are chiefly such as convey noble and magnanimous sentiments, and inculcate the practice of virtue. The lofty morals and noble maxims of Vatel seem to have impressed him strongly. The following is one quotation which the writer's recollection leads him to believe from that admirable author, though his name is not affixed to it: "We may say of states what has long been acknowledged in regard to private persons, that there is no better and safer policy than that which is founded on virtue. Cicero went so far as to maintain that no one could administer the public affairs in a salutary manner if he did not attach himself to the most exact justice." The following, added in parenthesis, is apparently Perry's own: "Truth is the ethereal spirit; neither individuals nor nations can be great without it." He quotes again: "Those who have searched deeply into morality are convinced that virtue is the only path that leads to true felicity; so that its maxims contain nothing less than the art of living happily." "A man who, by great application, has enabled himself to become useful to his country, or he who has performed some signal service to the state, may justly complain if he is overlooked in order to advance useless men without merit." "No sooner is danger in sight, than courage finds its post; and when men are overcome with fear, they are no longer envious." "Those who write down conversations or make minutes are dangerous people, and ought to be carefully guarded against." "Alexander was a prodigy of valour and fortune; but whether his virtues or his faults were greatest is hard to decide." "Caesar, who is commonly esteemed to have been the founder of a Roman empire, seems to have possessed, very eminently, all the qualities, both native and acquired, that enter into the composition of a hero; but failed of the attribute of honour, because he overthrew the laws of his country, and raised his greatness by the conquest of his fellow-citizens more than of their enemies." Such were the thoughts and maxims that fixed themselves in the mind of Perry, and found favour there. The writer has, perhaps, lingered unduly over the contents of this note-book, which furnishes the last written reflection of Perry's tastes and character. He was willing to defer until the latest moment the painful narration which must complete his task.

On Wednesday, the eleventh of August, Perry at length received from the Venezuelan secretary of state a reply to the note addressed by him to the vice-president, claiming indemnity for the vessels and property belonging to the citizens of the United States, illegally captured by the privateers and cruisers of the republic, and condemned within its territory. In this reply the principle of restitution was admitted, and promise was made of an early fulfillment of its obligation by the republic. The vice-president had previously pledged himself, on the behalf of the republic, that its cruisers and privateers would henceforth be restricted within narrower limits, and, by holding itself responsible for illegal captures, had contracted a motive of interest as well as duty to restrict them closely to the admitted rights of belligerents.

Having thus completed his business, the vice-president urged him so strongly to remain until the following Saturday, the fourteenth of August, to partake of a dinner given to him in the name of the government, that he did not think he could decline doing so in courtesy, or consistently with those objects of conciliation which had formed an important part of his errand. Meantime, he continued daily to visit the schooner, where Lieutenant Claxton, her commander, and Lieutenant W. D. Salter, who, from motives of curiosity, had come on leave from the John Adams, were now ill of the fever. According to his usual custom, he personally visited the sick, cheering them with encouraging words, and watching over their comfort. The surgeon, Dr. M. Morgan, was also ill. He had, however, been previously very successful in the treatment of the disease, which had not assumed a very virulent character; out of twenty cases that had occurred on board he had cured fifteen.

On Saturday, the commodore, with most of the officers of the schooner who were in health, dined with the vice-president, and were elegantly entertained. They were met by all the members of the government and the principal inhabitants. The commodore, having succeeded in the objects of his mission, and being about to proceed upon the ulterior duties intrusted to him in the River of Plate, forgot the temporary delays and vexatious distrust of this government by which he had been annoyed, and prepared to part with his entertainers with more kindly feelings. On the following day, being Sunday, the fifteenth of August, he assisted, by invitation, at the solemn proclamation of a new Constitution, which was celebrated amid religious ceremonies and the discharge of cannon.

After assisting at the ceremony of proclaiming the Constitution, Perry repaired on board the Nonsuch, and, weighing anchor, she dropped rapidly down the river. He had been slightly indisposed on Sunday, but on the following morning he rose in good health and cheerful spirits, being animated by the rapid motion as the schooner glided swiftly down the current, passing the shores with their magnificent vegetation so quickly that the trees seemed to glide away from her like magic. In the morning of the seventeenth he had his gig manned and pulled ahead of the schooner, along the bank of the river with his gun. In the evening the Nonsuch reached the bar at the mouth of the Orinoco, but the wind coming in strong from the southeast, rendered it difficult to cross it with safety during the night. She was therefore brought to anchor immediately on the bar.

During the night the wind freshened, bringing in considerable sea; and the schooner, which tended to the current, having her stern seaward, the spray occasionally broke over it, and, descending the companion-hatch of the trunk-cabin, wet the commodore as he lay in his berth without waking him. At about four o'clock in the morning he awoke with a cold chill. Doctor Forsyth had taken passage in the schooner, which was to proceed to the United States with despatches after falling in with the John Adams, and, being in the opposite berth to the commodore, was called by the latter to prescribe for him. At this time Doctor Morgan, the able and accomplished surgeon of the vessel, was himself confined to his cot by fever. Doctor Forsyth advised him to cover himself warmly, and had some warm ptisan made, of which he drank freely. In about an hour his chill went off, leaving him with great pain in the head and back, a hot skin, and great soreness of all the muscles; all his symptoms were considered by Doctor Forsyth to forebode a very severe attack of the prevailing disease.

Doctor Forsyth, having seen many cases of the disease on shore, and having treated those of the schooner after the illness of Doctor Morgan, and who was considered by the latter peculiarly qualified for the management of the disease, was unremitting in his attentions to the commodore. He commenced the use of cathartics, which had been successful in other cases, but with some caution, the pulse being strong and active. Finding no relief from this treatment, he tried the lancet, but quickly discovered that the constitution of the commodore would not bear the loss of much blood. His case proving so different from the others which had occurred on board, in which the strength of the patients had sustained them well under the same treatment, was considered a presage of great danger.

On the third day of the commodore's illness, Doctor Morgan made an effort to reach the cabin, where he found his patient in a most unpromising condition; restless from extreme pain, breathing with difficulty, and drawing occasionally a deep and tremulous respiration. The use of cathartics was still continued, while every effort was made to support his strength by agreeable and nourishing drinks. To allay the distressing heat of the head, he was sponged frequently while it continued with vinegar and water, which revived him greatly. Every remedy suited to the varying symptoms which skill could suggest, was used in turn, but without any permanent change for the better. Several times his skin became cool, and a gentle respiration came on; but in a few hours a new paroxysm of fever would destroy the hopes of his physicians.

Though apprehensive from the first that he would not survive the attack, he evinced a resolute determination not to allow this belief to affect his spirits, or influence unfavourably his chances of recovery. The miserable discomfort of his situation, in the small and confined cabin of the schooner, where ventilation was impossible, though rendered of the greatest importance by the excessive heat of the weather, made him very impatient to reach his ship, where he would be so much more at his ease; but the wind continued light and unfavourable, and the progress of the schooner very slow. On the fourth day after his attack, the Nonsuch was still forty miles from Port Spain, when Lieutenant Temple was despatched by the commander to state the condition of the commodore. At this time his strength was almost entirely gone, and all the efforts of his physicians were directed to sustain the powers of life and allay the pain under which he was suffering.

Throughout his illness he had undisturbed possession of all the faculties of his mind, conversing on his case and on any other subjects that occurred to him. In the language of Doctor Morgan, "His patience and fortitude never forsook him; his mind seemed entirely superior to the greatest agony of suffering that he felt. His sufferings were severe, but short; and whenever I requested him not to allow an unfavourable symptom to discourage or alarm him, he said, 'I feel no alarm at whatever may be the issue: the debt of mortality must be paid!' During the whole of his illness, he showed every characteristic that could be exhibited by a great man and a Christian." On another occasion, it being his birthday, when speaking of his probable decease, the commodore had remarked, his mind reverting, no doubt, to the rare felicity of his domestic relations, and to the tender ties which his death would sever, "Few persons have greater inducements to make them wish to live than I; but I am perfectly ready to go if it pleases the Almighty to take me; 'the debt of nature must be paid!'"

At noon of Monday, the twenty-third of August, the schooner was within six miles of her port. The commodore, though in good spirits, was in extremity; a deep and distressing hiccough came on at frequent intervals, and his breathing had become hurried. He now requested Doctor Morgan to inform him if any fatal symptoms should occur, assuring him that he would not suffer the intelligence to influence unfavourably his farther chances of recovery. Soon after he was seized with vomiting, and the disease assumed its most fatal form. So soon as he was again at his ease, he requested Doctor Morgan to call Lieutenants Claxton and Salter into the cabin, and to return himself. When they were assembled, he stated to them that he was fully sensible that he could not survive many more of the painful paroxysms of his disease; that he had always previously had a will with him, and, if he survived long enough, would get Mr. Handy to draw one; but, in the contrary event, he declared in their presence, and wished it distinctly understood, that he bequeathed all his property, whether real or personal, together with the guardianship of his children to his wife; his effects and papers, including the instructions under which he was acting, he committed to the custody of Mr. Handy. When he had completed this task, he said that he had wished for some time to do it, and now felt greatly relieved. He begged the gentlemen to retire.

Soon after, a boat arrived from the John Adams, with Lieutenant Turner, Doctor Osborne, her surgeon, in whom Perry had very great confidence, and Mr. C. O. Handy. Although his bad symptoms had returned, he was much gratified to learn that these friends had come to him. His sensibility was touched when he saw by his bedside Lieutenant Turner, that trusty companion in former perils, and sharer of his more brilliant fortunes. With an effort, he maintained his calmness and serenity, making many inquiries about the ship, the officers, and the crew. Soon after he asked that Mr. Handy might come to him. Mr. Turner bore the message; and as he came from the cabin he was affected beyond the power of concealment at the spectacle of his dying friend and commander.

The thermometer was ranging at this time at ninety. Mr. Handy found the heat and confined air of the cabin intolerable, it being necessary to exclude the light, which had become painful to the commodore, and with it such little air as could reach that worst of all dungeons, the trunk-cabin of a schooner. The commodore was lying on the cabin deck, where his mattress had been placed as a more airy situation than the berth at the side. He extended his hand towards his former secretary, the faithful friend whom he had cherished and benefited, and upon whose heart he had made an impression which death could not efface. The commodore, slightly wandering at this moment, succeeded by an effort in looking Mr. Handy in the face, asked him how he had been, and remarked that they had all been very ill on board of the schooner. He added that he wished Mr. Handy to draw up a paper for him, but it would do to-morrow; and manifested a strong desire to reach the John Adams, and escape from the painful discomfort of his present situation.

Ineffectual efforts were now made by his able medical attendants to support the remaining powers of his life. But his strength failed rapidly, his skin grew cold and clammy, and became tinged with yellow; with his rapidly failing strength, the pain which he had hitherto suffered passed away, and at half past three o'clock he expired, without any convulsion. Thus, on his birthday, at the age of thirty-four years, died Oliver Hazard Perry, of a painful disease, surrounded by every discomfort, yet with a calmness and resignation honourable to his character and worthy of his renown.

The Nonsuch was within a mile of the John Adams when Perry died. This event soon became known on board of her by the lowering of his pendant. The deepest gloom existed among the officers and crews of both vessels, to whom he had strongly endeared himself by his justice, his kindness, and his solicitude for their comfort and welfare during the brief period of his command. The greatest anxiety existed among the senior and other officers, that the remains of their beloved commander should be transported to his home for interment. The surgeons were of the opinion that it was advisable that the body should be buried at Port Spain, and the transfer take place at some future day, when the nation would not fail to reclaim the remains of one of its noblest sons.

Application was therefore made by Lieutenant Turner to Sir Ralph Woodford, the governor of Trinidad, for leave to land the body of Commodore Perry for interment. The necessary leave was courteously granted by the governor, with expressions of concern for the painful intelligence thus first communicated to him. At four o'clock on Tuesday, the twenty-fourth of August, the remains of Commodore Perry left the side of the John Adams, attended by the boats of the two vessels, containing their officers and one hundred and twenty of the seamen, in order to allow as many as possible of the crew to join in this last act of respect to a beloved commander.

As the boats cleared the ship, pulling slowly, with measured strokes, in concert with each other, minute-guns commenced from her, and were continued until the procession reached the wharf, when they were resumed by the battery at fort St. Andrew. The remains were received on landing by the Third West India Regiment, with arms reversed, the officers wearing white scarfs and hatbands; the regimental band followed in the procession, playing a mournful march, and then the commandant of the garrison and his staff. Officers of rank, on horseback, attended the hearse as bearers, while the officers of the John Adams and Nonsuch, a large concourse of the most respectable inhabitants, and the American sailors, followed as mourners, the procession being closed by Sir Ralph Woodford. The presence of the governor was a very uncommon token of respect; being the representative of the sovereign, it is not usual for him to attend funerals. As the procession moved through the streets, the balconies were crowded with ladies, who evinced deep sensibility as the solemn pageant passed them.

The funeral service having been impressively performed, the body was lowered into the grave and three volleys fired over it. The minute-guns now ceased from the fort, and, in the language of the local newspaper, giving an account of the funeral, "the whole body of attendants on the funeral retired from the burying-ground with every mark of sympathetic grief for the premature death of a gallant man, and a good parent and citizen."

The officers were at a loss to account at the time for the extraordinary respect and sympathy, so congenial to their feelings, evinced by all classes of inhabitants. They were subsequently informed that some of the officers of the Forty-first Regiment were removed at the close of the war to the island of Trinidad, and the prisoners taken in the British squadron on Lake Erie and at the battle of the Thames were enthusiastic in their grateful expressions of the kindness of Commodore Perry, and their admiration of him as a commander and as a man. When it was known that he was to visit Port Spain by the arrival of the John Adams from the mouth of the Orinoco, the greatest desire was created to see him; and when at length he came among them only to expire at the entrance of their port, all that they could do was, by respect to his remains, to express their deep sympathy. His character, as described by his enemies, "brave, generous, humane," had prepossessed every one in his favour; and the story of his youth, of his manly beauty, of the tender attachment which had bound him to life as a husband and a father—a story soon told when death has closed the scene—tenderly affected the female spectators; the busy sympathies of woman travelled beyond the intervening waste of waters, and shed tears of compassion for those who, unsuspecting of evil, were doubtless even then thinking of the absent one as in health, and looking with joyful hope to a reunion which should never be realized.

So strongly and gratefully, indeed, were the American officers affected by these marked evidences of sympathy on the part of strangers and former enemies, that they took occasion to express their thanks in a public manner in the following paragraph:

"The officers of the United States' vessels John Adams and Nonsuch, tender their grateful acknowledgments to the inhabitants of Port Spain for their kind and respectful attention to the funeral rites of their late commander, Commodore Perry. The disposition manifested by all classes was highly in unison with their feelings, and merits their warmest thanks."

Lieutenants Claxton and Turner, on their own behalf and in the name of the officers of the squadron, returned thanks by letter to the governor of the island, and to the commander of the garrison and his officers, for their earnest and successful efforts to give to the funeral of their beloved commander a character of dignity and solemnity, honourable to his memory, and most congenial to their own feelings; assuring them both that the circumstances would be highly appreciated by their countrymen, to whom they would be duly made known. Both gentlemen returned respectful and complimentary answers; and Sir Ralph Woodford took occasion to express his lively "regret, that the hopes which he had entertained of receiving Commodore Perry within that government with the consideration due to his rank and merits had been so fatally disappointed."

As the farther objects of the cruise, including the visit to Buenos Ayres, could no longer be prosecuted, the John Adams proceeded at once to the United States, under the command of Lieutenant Claxton and Lieutenant Turner was transferred to the command of the Nonsuch. The manly heart of this faithful friend and follower of Perry through so many and such various scenes, was deeply affected in announcing to a mutual friend their mournful bereavement. He thus described the last moments of the commodore: "He preserved his heroic firmness and unyielding fortitude to the last, and was perfectly collected and resigned to his fate. I had only the melancholy satisfaction of being with him in his last moments, having repaired on board as soon as the schooner hove in sight. His sufferings from the violence of the disorder were great, but he sustained them with perfect patience, and continued in the possession and exercise of his mental faculties. I cannot give you farther particulars, but must reserve for some future occasion a detailed account. I am alike distracted with private feeling by the event, and by the severe pressure of public duties. My heart bleeds for Mrs. Perry, and I know the general distress which must prevail at his loss. For myself, he was my best and dearest friend, and I cannot but weep over his fate."

Mr. Turner rightly appreciated the feeling with which the announcement of Perry's death would be received in the United States. The one fault of his life had been redeemed and forgotten; and his countrymen now only remembered his splendid services, and the lustre which he had shed upon the American name. The voice of sorrow spread over the whole republic; and legislative enactments in various states proclaimed the magnitude of the national loss, and deep condolence with those to whom, as a private one, it had been so overpowering. Mr. Monroe, representing the sovereignty of the nation, and speaking in its name, took occasion to say, in his first succeeding annual message to Congress, that the death of Commodore Perry was regarded as a national calamity. The president sent messages of condolence to the bereaved family of the commodore. He directed the secretary of the navy to cause the expenses of his funeral, which had been unavoidably large, to be a charge upon the treasury department; and, in due time, a national ship was despatched on the express errand of bringing the remains of Perry to Newport for interment, where, in the public burying-ground, a granite obelisk now marks his tomb. Congress, taking into consideration the extraordinary services rendered by Perry to his country, solemnly adopted his family, took charge of its maintenance and the country which he had so well served became the parent of his fatherless children. An annuity of four hundred dollars, commencing on the day of Perry's death, was settled on his widow, and one hundred and fifty dollars, until they should be of age, on each of his sons, for their education and maintenance. On his daughter, born a few days before the arrival of the news of his death, a similar annuity of one hundred and fifty dollars was settled, to continue until her marriage. The gift was a most liberal one; and the motive which impelled Congress to so unusual a grant was no less honourable to that body than to the fame of Perry.

But if the death of Perry was regretted by his countrymen as a national calamity, how must it have been felt within the narrow circle of his home? That home had quite recently gained a new endearment. The birth of a daughter had been a source of unusual delight to its mother, for the sake of that gratification which it was sure to convey to the absent father. The news had been despatched with all haste, and it had been discovered with delight that the letter containing it had reached the Constellation before her departure to join Perry's command. It might be left to the imagination of the reader to divine how these tidings were received; but among the letters placed in the writer's possession by the sister of Commodore Perry is the one first written by his widow to his mother. The chief interest that the public have in this letter is the aid which it affords in estimating the character of Perry by illustrating that of the partner of his bosom. A man may be as well judged by the character of the woman whom he has loved and won as by any other single circumstance. The insight, therefore, which this letter gives into the character of Perry, by exhibiting that of his wife, and the attachment which she bore him, is essential, in some measure, to its right appreciation. Besides, the domestic relations of Perry have been excluded from this work more than is usual or desirable in biography, Mrs. Perry having scrupled to furnish the writer with any extracts from the private correspondence of the commodore with a view to carrying on the course of the narrative. He cannot, therefore, believe that the publication of the following letter will meet with her approbation, though given with the authority of the person from whom it was received, with a view of more particularly illustrating the life and character of Perry.

"November 13th.

"With what words or in what way shall I address you, my dear mother, when I stand so much in need of comfort myself, and of that consolation which God only can bestow, who has seen fit to blast my tenderest joys? When I look back to the happy anticipations with which we parted, all seems to me like a frightful dream, and that the being whom we both so fondly idolized must yet return to cherish and protect me. What I have since suffered my Maker only knows, for I have but a confused recollection of those awful hours when I first was told my beloved husband was no more. Speech seemed denied me, and for many bitter days my only wish was to see his grave and follow him. Even his children were no tie to me; and the birth of the dear little innocent, over whom I had so often rejoiced, was lamented in the bitterest terms. Thank God, the sharpness of those feelings is subdued; and though I daily weep for him, I can feel that there is mercy and blessings still left for me. My friends were devoted to me, and my uncle was like a father. But at such a moment sympathy and kindness avail but little; nature must have its vent, or the aching heart would break. Perry, sick and expiring, seems constantly before my eyes; but, in the midst of his distress, that he was able to be composed and resigned, affords the greatest consolation to us all. That none of those who were near and dear to him were permitted to sooth his last hours has almost broken my heart, and that my dear little daughter can never know a father's blessing or a father's love has caused the keenest regrets; but they are unavailing, and you must have felt and shared them with me. The ways of God are dark and intricate, but they are doubtless just; my beloved husband has gone from me; but he has left a name to his country and children that is without a stain; he was my guardian angel on earth, and will, I trust, continue one in Heaven. Time may soften the anguish I now feel, but can never efface from my heart his virtues, his kindness, and his affection towards me. My love and respect for his memory will always lead me to act as if he was present with me. To his children I shall devote my future days; the world has now lost its greatest charm, and I look forward to a reunion that will be eternal and imperishable. On me has devolved a great and important charge, and my first prayer to Heaven was for strength and discretion so to manage them as to make his children useful and virtuous members of society.

"Ah, my dear mother, how many bitter hours I have yet to suffer before I can think with composure on my loss. I am young in life to have had my deepest happiness so soon destroyed. My cup of felicity was perfect; and from fifteen to the present hour, my heart never wavered from its first affections. My husband was all to me, and for him I could have left every friend on earth. He spoke of me to the last in the most endearing terms; his children, his mother, all his relations, had his dying blessing, and the last act of his life was that of love and confidence towards me. But I can write no more, for I have wept till my sight is almost gone, and my heart nearly broken. God bless you all: my kindest love to Anne and the family. In the midst of my sorrow I remembered them all, and feel anxious to hear of her safety. May her husband long be preserved to her, and comfort you for what you have lost. Write me when you are able, and believe me your affectionate daughter,

The promise self-made by Perry's youthful widow in the first moment of affliction, to devote her future days to his children, and to act as if he were ever present, has been most amply redeemed. All her days have been so devoted, and her maternal solicitude has received its appropriate blessing. As if in that one mysterious dispensation, to which she has learned to bow in submission, she had exhausted her cup of sorrow, no new calamity has since visited her. Not one of her children has been taken from her, and she has been spared the still greater hardship of unrequited care and affection; of seeing them become other than an honour to the memory of their father, and a testimony of her watchful and judicious nurture and persevering solicitude. The adopted children of the country, that country has a right to know that its bounty has not been wasted, and that all have been reared to virtue and usefulness. The eldest, Grant Champlin Perry, after pursuing his academic and collegiate course with unusual credit, is now a practising physician in his native town; the second, Oliver Hazard Perry, inheriting the profession with the name of his father, and with his profession and his name many of his characteristic virtues, after having passed his examination for a lieutenancy, head of a very large class of midshipmen, is now on service in the Exploring Expedition; the third son, Christopher Raymond, likewise devoted to the service of the country which adopted him, is a cadet of very distinguished standing at the Military Academy; the daughter, bearing her mother's name, and having been unceasingly her companion, cannot fail to be like her in all things. And thus the gratitude of the country, exhibited towards the children of a great national benefactor, is receiving new returns in the training of useful and honourable citizens and servants.

It has been the effort of the writer, in the foregoing pages, to illustrate the life of Perry by a minute and faithful description of his actions. Trusting that the impression of these will remain in the memory of the reader, he will not attempt to sum them up, but briefly recapitulate the distinguishing traits of his character. The scenes through which we have carried him render it almost unnecessary to say that Perry united immovable firmness to the highest and most chivalrous courage, and a calmness and self-possession which never forsook him. Danger, instead of disturbing the ordinary exercise of his faculties, seemed but to stimulate and develop them. Prompt to decide, immovable in his decisions, energetic in carrying them into effect—to these valuable qualities he added an untiring industry and enterprise which rose at the prospect of labour and difficulty. He did not rush impetuously at an undertaking, and afterward falter and become discouraged at the prospect of unexpected obstacles, but, commencing with calm earnestness, never paused short of complete fulfillment. He had the rare faculty of seeing things as they were, undisturbed by the mists of feeling, hopes, or prejudices. His mind was strong and well-poised; not imaginative, perhaps, or fanciful; but characterized by sound sense, enlightening an unbiased judgment which was rarely at fault. To this was added a correct taste, regulating his words and actions, and rendering them consistent and becoming.

A mind thus naturally vigorous and discriminating had been much enriched by extensive reading among choice and well-selected books, particularly in ancient history and the biography of the illustrious dead. For amusement, he turned with greatest pleasure to the older dramatists, and Shakespeare was his fast favourite. He was not only thoroughly familiar with the text of this author, which he studied with schoolboy earnestness, but had read all the most approved commentaries; he had, moreover, opinions of his own with regard to the various prominent characters of these dramas, which he is said, by one who knew him intimately, to have discussed in a masterly manner, unfolding their beauties with rare discrimination and taste. He had, indeed, on all subjects, a happy faculty of using and imparting the information he had obtained; and his judicious remarks were always enhanced by the absence of pedantry and pretension, and by his pervading modesty. He also wrote with great facility and correctness. His extreme aversion to the use of the pen probably led him to that conciseness and force which is conspicuous in his letters. He never dwelt over any composition, and not more than two draughts of important letters in his own hand are to be found among his papers. He had not the common affectation of the great, and often of the little great, of writing unintelligibly; his handwriting, like his style, was rapid, easy and elegant; a picture, in some sort, of the fairness and simplicity of his character.

Envy, hatred, malice, and uncharitableness found no resting place in the heart of Perry. There was no room there for any but the noblest feelings and affections. He was not disturbed by petty irritability on trifling occasions, though his temper was violent, and easily roused by injustice towards others or himself. It was his pride, down to a certain period of his life, that he had his temper under perfect control, until a personal insult, from which his guarded and dignified manners had ever before protected him, by producing a fit of ungovernable passion, convinced him that his command of himself was less perfect than he had supposed. The active benevolence and overflowing humanity of Perry exhibited itself as often as sickness, misery, or misfortune presented itself for his commiseration. A few anecdotes of this striking characteristic of him have been recorded; of how many must he have carried the knowledge with him to his grave? For in acts like these, and his efforts in behalf of his friends, it was eminently his custom to do good by stealth.

Perry was discriminating in the choice of his friends, and warm and constant in his attachment to them; never permitting an opportunity to pass unimproved to do them kindness or to advance their interests. He possessed eminently the faculty of creating strong affection for his person in those who were intimate with him. With regard to those who were accidentally associated with him, and for whom he had no previous or particular regard, he was rather disposed to discover their good qualities than to be censorious of their faults. He was unsuspecting in his temper, and gives himself the character of being credulous; the fault of a noble mind, conscious of no evil itself, and suspecting none in others. His magnanimity was conspicuous, and betrayed him into some indiscretions. He had a chivalrous sense of the courtesy that is due to woman, and the most enthusiastic admiration of the female character. He was remarkable for his aversion for all grovelling, vulgar, and sensual propensities, amounting to positive detestation.

As a naval commander, he was sensitively alive to the appearance, order, and efficiency of his vessel; everything connected with the management of the sails, and a skilful performance of every duty connected with the fighting department, received his zealous and unwearied attention. As an officer and as a seaman he was equally eminent. He had a thorough sympathy with all under his command, attended personally to the comfort of his crew, to solace the sick, preserve the health of those who were well, and watch, in every way, over the welfare of all. He was a strict disciplinarian; but always punished with reluctance, and only when unavoidable. With the officers, his extraordinary faculty of creating a lively attachment for his person spared him the necessity of frequent censure; a disapproving glance of his eye had often more effect than the stern rebuke of others. The unwillingness of his officers to offend him was extreme. Among his correspondence there are many evidences of this peculiarity, in letters written after the commission of some trifling fault, evincing not so much an apprehension of his official disapprobation, as the loss of his favourable opinion and esteem. Every germ of merit was sure to be discovered and encouraged by him, and no opportunity ever lost of advancing those who performed their duty with cheerfulness and fidelity. His attention to the moral and intellectual training of his midshipmen was unceasing. No want of encouragement from the subjects of his solicitude, no reluctance to learn, no resistance to being taught, turned him back from the determined prosecution of this all-important but much-neglected duty. As an officer, Perry has been compared to Nelson; and his battle was considered to have resembled, in the mode in which it was won, those of that distinguished hero. Instead, however, of being flattered at thus erecting Nelson into a standard of excellence by which to estimate the greatness of others, British writers have shown indignation at the comparison, and sneered at the idea of our "Nelsonic victory." Their haughty pride does not permit them to conceive that as noble a heart may beat beneath the plain blue coat of an American officer, as within the starred and ribanded breast of their titled hero. Perry was not less brave, not less chivalrous, not less patriotic than Nelson; equally humane to his own countrymen, more humane to his enemies; his single victory was more truly the fruit of his own heroism. In his moral character, how superior was Perry to Nelson: compare his unshaken fidelity for the chosen partner of his bosom with Nelson's abandonment of his; the single fault of Perry, his outrage of an officer who had insulted him, and to whom he instantly offered atonement, with the crime which Nelson perpetrated at the bidding of the woman to whom he had already sacrificed his vows made on the altar, and her happiness in whose behalf they had been offered.

The person of Perry was one of the loftiest stature and most graceful mould. He was easy and measured in his movements, and calm in his air. His brow was full, massive, and lofty, his features regular and elegant, and his eye full, dark, and lustrous. His mouth was uncommonly handsome, and his teeth large, regular, and very white. The prevailing expression of his countenance was mild, benignant, and cheerful, and a smile of amiability, irresistibly pleasing, played in conversation about his lips. His whole air was expressive of health, freshness, comfort, and contentment, bearing testimony to a life of temperance and moderation.

In his private character Perry was a model of every domestic virtue and grace; an affectionate and devoted husband, a fond father, and a faithful and generous friend; most happy in the domestic and social relations which he had formed for himself, and the centre and cause of happiness to those who surrounded him. Thoroughly domestic in his tastes, yet social in his feelings, hospitable without ostentation, and not averse to a measured and regulated conviviality in the midst of his family and friends; eminently urbane and modest in demeanour, yet ever willing, as able, to take his fair share in the general entertainment. The amiability of Perry was one of his most distinguishing traits, and the susceptibility of his feelings was excessive. Such are some of the attributes of the character of Perry. A brief anecdote will show with what sentiments he impressed one of the noblest of Americans. When Decatur was first informed by Mr. Handy of the particulars of the death of Perry, he was sensibly affected; after a short pause, he remarked, with great solemnity, "Sir! the American Navy has lost its brightest ornament!"

These are doubtless the very words which Perry would have used with reference to his endeared and gallant friend, had he lived a little longer; what each, forgetting himself, would in like circumstances have exclaimed of the other. They were, indeed, a pair of noble brothers, too soon, alas! withdrawn from a profession which they honoured and adorned; of whom, however, still remains to us a bright and enduring example of whatever, in a sea-officer, is truly admirable and worthy of imitation.

APPENDIX.

Jesse D. Elliott, of the United States' Navy.*

FIRST CHARGE.

That the said Captain Elliott having, on the 10th of September, 1813, during the engagement on Lake Erie between the American and British fleets, before the eyes of the enemy, conducted himself in his command of the United States' brig Niagara in such a manner as to incur the reproaches of the American fleet, and of the American army, then stationed in the neighbourhood, under the command of Major-general Harrison, and of the citizens of the surrounding country; and having, in this unfortunate situation, experienced from his commanding officer all the relief, and the most friendly countenance and support which (without absolute inconsistency with truth) it was in the power of that officer to afford him, was, as soon as left in the command of that lake, and after the departure of his said commanding officer, guilty of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, by immediately entering upon and pursuing a series of intrigues, designed to repair his own reputation at the expense and sacrifice of his said commanding officer.

Specification first.

Because the said Captain Elliott, on or about the month of November, 1813, procured a certificate from Lieutenant Smith, whom the said Elliott had attempted to dishonour by representing him as guilty of misconduct during said engagement; which certificate was intended to reflect on the said Captain Perry; insidiously to misrepresent his conduct during said engagement, and to impeach the truth of his official report there-of. And because, at or near the same time, the said Captain Elliott procured a certificate to be signed by Lieutenant Edwards, Purser Magrath, Doctor Barton, and Acting Sailing-master Webster, having the same import and design, and containing a perverted statement of the conduct and language of the said Captain Perry when he came on board of the Niagara during said battle, although the said Elliott well knew that neither of the said officers was then present; that the said Edwards was on the forecastle, that the said Magrath was at the time absent from that vessel, and the said doctor and sailing-master were in the cockpit, or elsewhere below, and could neither of them have had any personal knowledge of the pretended facts stated, which they could only have taken from the representations of the said Captain Elliott himself; which certificates, in such manner obtained, were, by the said Captain Elliott, without notifying the said Captain Perry, procured to be transmitted to the secretary of the navy, for the purpose of injuring the reputation of the said Captain Perry in the opinion of the government.

Because the said Captain Elliott, at Baltimore, in or about the month of January, 1815, in presence of Captain Charles Ridgely, of the United States' Navy, did falsely, and with malice, represent the conduct of his said commanding officer in said engagement on the 10th of September, 1813; insinuating that, when the said commanding officer came on board of the Niagara during the battle, he was in despair, and ready, to all appearance, to surrender the fleet; but the said commanding officer, finding no reason to believe that he, the said Captain Elliott, would consent to such a measure, the fight was renewed, and he, the said Captain Elliott, cheered and reanimated his said commanding officer. And at Lake Erie, on or about the month of January, 1814, in the presence of Lieutenant Concklin, did make the same, or similar false imputations upon the conduct of his said commanding officer.

Specification third.

That he, the said Captain Elliott, during the months of October and November, 1813, repeatedly stated to Doctor Wallace, of Erie, and to others, that his said commanding officer had, under the influence of fear or despair, thrown overboard his flag called the motto-flag, which had been prepared by Captain Perry to excite and encourage his men, containing the dying words of Lawrence, after whom his ship was named, "Don't give up the ship," and the said flag had been picked up by another officer; which said assertions said Elliott knew to be false, and that said flag was still flying on board of the Lawrence when Captain Perry left that vessel, and was never lost or

Specification fourth.

That the said Elliott, about the month of September, 1813, made or procured to be made and exhibited to some of the officers a false drawing or sketch of the battle of the 10th of September, 1813, in which drawing he placed himself, in the Niagara and in the Somers, in positions of danger and service he had never occupied during the engagement; and represented other vessels, which had gallantly fought and distinguished themselves, in situations distant from the scene of action, and as rendering no service.

Specification fifth.

That, on or about the 22d of October, 1813, at Erie, he, the said Captain Elliott, in presence of General Harrison, asserted that he, the said Captain Elliott, was in close action during the whole of said engagement; that the said Captain Perry had done him injustice in not so stating in his official report; and that said Perry had promised, before said official report was despatched, to alter that part of it to which he, the said Elliott, objected, but had failed to do so; all which representations he, the said Elliott, knew to be wholly without truth.

Because the said Captain Elliott, at Erie, in the months of November and December, 1813, and from that time until he left the station at Lake Erie, about the month of May, 1814, and also at Buffalo during the same period, and particularly in November and December, 1813, did, in a manner calculated to bring contempt and reproach upon his profession and upon the service, continually assail and beset the inhabitants of those towns and the vicinity (especially those most ignorant and easily imposed upon) with verbal accounts and descriptions of the engagement of the 10th September on Lake Erie, destitute of all truth, and calculated to reflect on the said Captain Perry; and falsely to assume to himself a principal share in the victory obtained on said lake.

Specification seventh.

Because the said Elliott, at Lake Erie, on or about the 28th of October, 1813, did descend to various unmanly acts, in order to prevail upon Lieutenant Turner to give him such a certificate of good conduct, in the engagement of the 10th of September, as he knew could not be given with truth; and, although Lieutenant Turner not only resisted his importunities, but showed a strong repugnance to giving him any certificate whatever, yet the said Captain Elliott pursued and urged him, and finally appealed to his feelings, by saying that the unfavourable reports of his conduct during the said battle had come to the ears of his wife and rendered her unhappy; and declaring upon his honour that, if Lieutenant Turner would give him a certificate, he would make no other use of it than as a means of allaying her uneasiness; and, by such unworthy means, the said Captain Elliott succeeded in extorting from said Lieutenant Turner such a certificate as that gentleman hoped he might venture to give for such an occasion.

Because the said Elliott, in the months of October and November, 1813, resorted to unbecoming acts and persuasion in order to prevail on other officers, then under his command (particularly Sailing-masters Champlin, Brownell, and McDonald), to give him certificates of good conduct in said engagement of 10th September, so contrary to their opinions that all, or most of them, refused to give any such certificate.

Specification ninth.

Because the said Captain Elliott, at Erie, on or about the 10th November, 1813, in a manner derogatory to the character of an American officer, questioned some of the British officers, then prisoners, of whom he had the charge (particularly Lieutenant Bignall), relative to his the said Captain Elliott's conduct in the late engagement, and for the purpose of obtaining from them a favourable declaration of his having been in close action in the Niagara during said engagement.

Because the said Captain Elliott, on the night of the 19th

September, on Lake Erie (having first, in a previous interview, excited the compassion of his commanding officer by lamenting the injury his character had sustained, and declaring that he had lost the finest opportunity that ever man had of distinguishing himself), did address to the said officer a note, in the style of friendly solicitation, calculated to produce in his favour, from said officer, an expression of the friendly disposition and wish to relieve the said Captain Elliott manifested by that officer in said interview; and did afterward, in the Erie Gazette of 1st November, 1813, cause a false copy of said note (of his) to be published, by which said note was made to assume a different tone and import; and did also, at the same time, cause to be published in said Gazette the friendly letter or certificate of his said commanding officer as being a reply thereto.

All which practices, stated in the foregoing specifications, were resorted to by the said Captain Elliott, after his commanding officer had exerted his utmost personal influence with the officers of the fleet and others, for the purpose of screening the said Captain Elliott from the consequences of his conduct during said engagement; and had, in drawing his official report of that engagement, studiously laboured to devise some pardonable mode of representing that transaction, by which he might be able happily to get over the objectionable part of said Elliott's conduct on that day, and, at the same time, to name him with credit and honour.

Specification eleventh.

Because the said Captain Elliott did, on the 14th May, 1818, address to the said Captain Perry a letter, enclosing therein, as the cause of said letter, copies of certain certificates, stating expressions, alleged to have been made use of by Captain Perry towards the said Captain Elliott, without calling upon the said Captain Perry to avow, deny, or explain, or justify said expressions, descending to the most unmanly and vulgar abuse. In which said letter, also, the said Captain Perry is represented, wholly without truth, as having declared to Captain Elliott, at Erie, that, if he would not dwell on the action, he, the said Perry, would write a private letter to the honourable secretary of the navy, and express his surprise that the country did not give him, the said Captain Elliott, half the honour of the victory; and, in the same letter, the said Elliott again misrepresented the style and import of his said note, mentioned in the last specification, giving it the tone of a categorical demand upon the said Captain Perry, to contradict the reports which were put in circulation prejudicial to the character of the said Captain Elliott, as if he, the said Captain Elliott, would insinuate that, at the time of writing of the said note, he considered said reports to have been put in circulation by the said Captain Perry, and that he accordingly called upon him, in said note, to contradict them.

CHARGE SECOND.

Specification first.

Because the said Captain Elliott, about the 1st of October, 1813, on board the gunboat Scorpion, commanded by Sailing-master Champlin, then on Lake St. Clair, in the presence of said Champlin, intemperately and unjustly abused the said Captain Perry, his said commanding officer on Lake Erie, and expressly declared that he had had it in his power to destroy the fleet, and the said Perry with it, and he only regretted that he had not done so; and farther there declared, that the officers and men of the Lawrence were not entitled to prize-money or account of the vessels of the enemy captured on Lake Erie, but that the officers and crews of the other vessels of the American fleet were entitled to prize-money for the recapture of the Lawrence. And because the said Captain Elliott did again, at Buffalo, in November and December, 1813, publicly express the same wish that he had sacrificed the American fleet on Lake Erie, together with the said Captain Perry, its commander.

Specification second.

Because the said Captain Elliott, at Erie, on or about the 26th October, 1813, declared, in the presence of Dr. Wallace of that place, that it would be a serious question between the two governments (meaning the American and British) whether Captain

Perry was not to be considered as a prisoner of war.

Specification third.

Because the said Captain Elliott, in the month of November, 1813, at Erie and at Buffalo, asserted publicly that the American flag, for the first time since the declaration of war, had been disgraced on board the Lawrence (meaning that such disgrace had been incurred by that vessel in the engagement of the 10th September on Lake Erie).

Specification fourth.

Because the said Elliott, at Erie, in the months of October and November, 1813, declared, in the presence of Dr. Wallace of that place, and others, that the American fleet had gained no honour in the engagement of the 10th September on Lake Erie, and that, from the superiority of force, the British fleet might have been taken in fifteen minutes; although he, the said Captain Elliott, well knew that the force of the enemy in that engagement was superior to that of the American fleet.

CHARGE THIRD.

That the said Captain Elliott was guilty of oppression towards certain officers and men under his command on Lake Erie.

Specification first.

Because the said Captain Elliott, on Lake Erie, on or about the month of January, 1814, put Lieutenant Concklin under arrest, without any other cause than that the said Lieutenant Concklin went out of said Captain Elliott's cabin, declaring to him that he would not remain there to hear such reflections upon the character of Captain Perry as were then made by the said Captain Elliott, which reflections are stated in the second preceding specification, first charge.

Specification second.

Because the said Captain Elliott violently beat with a trumpet one of the men on board of the gunboat Somers for laughing when he perceived or supposed the said Captain Elliott to dodge a chainshot which happened to pass over that vessel, near to Captain Elliott, during the engagement of 10th September, 1813.

Specification third.

Because the said Captain Elliott, during the months of November and December, 1813, while left in command on Lake Erie, took every opportunity of manifesting an unjust hostility towards the surviving officers and men of the Lawrence, and particularly towards such officers of the fleet as had declined giving him certificates of good conduct; on all occasions selecting such officers and men for the most severe duties, and placing them in the most uncomfortable situations, in such manner as to excite the observation of the whole fleet.

CHARGE FOURTH.

That the said Captain Elliott, on the 10th December, 1813, being then a master commander in the navy of the United States, and commanding the United States' brig Niagara, one of the American squadron on Lake Erie, did not use his utmost exertion to carry into execution the orders of his commanding officer to join in the battle on that day between the American and British fleets.

Specification of the fourth charge.

Because the American squadron having sailed, in search of the enemy, a few days previous, the following orders and instructions were issued by the commanding officer, viz., 1st. An order directing in what manner the line of battle should be formed: the several vessels to keep within half a cable's length of each other, and enjoining it upon the commanders to preserve their stations in the line, and in all cases to keep as near to the commanding officer's vessel (the Lawrence) as possible. 2d. An order of attack: in which order the Lawrence was designated to attack the enemy's new ship (afterward ascertained to have been named the Detroit), and the

Niagara, commanded by the said Captain Elliott, designated to attack the enemy's ship "Queen Charlotte;" which orders were then communicated to all the commanders, including the said Captain Elliott, who, for that purpose, and to receive farther orders and instructions, were, by signal, called together by the said commanding officer, and all the said commanders, including the said Captain Elliott, were then, by the said commanding officer, expressly farther instructed, that "if, in the expected engagement, they laid their vessels close alongside of those of the enemy, they could not be out of their way." 3d. When coming into action, an order was passed, by trumpet, for the vessels astern to close up in the line; and, after the enemy had commenced firing, the signal was made by the said commanding officer for the fleet to come into action, each vessel against her opponent, as before designated; yet did he, the said Captain Elliott, notwithstanding said orders, and in violation thereof, keep his said brig, the Niagara, nearly a mile's distance astern of the Lawrence, and a still greater distance from the whole of the enemy's fleet, during more than two hours of the battle, although but a few moments before its commencement he was within hail of the Lawrence, and might with ease have followed that vessel into close action; instead of which he, the said Captain Elliott, failed to come into close action, and to engage the enemy's ship the Queen Charlotte, as he was bound to do by said order, and by the example of the commanding officer's vessel, and did remain, during the whole period before mentioned, at such a distance from the enemy as to render all the guns of the Niagara useless, except two long ones, which, consequently, were the only guns fired from that vessel during all the said time, and by which, at so great a distance, but little, if any, effect upon the enemy could be produced; of which misconduct and breach of orders the said Captain Elliott was guilty, without any necessity, cause, or excuse, his said vessel being in all respects, in size, force, equipment, and crew, and sailing, fully equal to the Lawrence and the ship he was ordered to engage; and, being also to the windward of the enemy, said vessel could not easily have been kept out of close action, unless the said Captain Elliott had, for that purpose, kept, as he did, her main-topsail aback and her jib brailed up; by doing which, and by keeping the wind instead of bearing down upon the enemy, he, the said Captain Elliott, finally carried his said vessel on the outside of the Lawrence and Caledonia, placing those vessels between him and the enemy, and was, when his said commanding officer went on board that vessel, keeping her on a course by the wind, which would, in a few minutes, have carried said vessel entirely out of the action; to prevent which, and in order to bring the said vessel into close action with the enemy, the said commanding officer was under the necessity of heaving to and immediately wearing said vessel, and altering her course at least eight points.

CHARGE FIFTH.

That the said Captain Elliott, on the 10th September, 1813, being then commander of the United States' brig Niagara, one of the American squadron on Lake Erie, through cowardice, negligence, or disaffection, did not, in the action on said lake on that day between the American and British fleets, do his utmost to take or destroy the vessel of the enemy which it was his duty to encounter.

Specification.

CHARGE SIXTH.

That the said Captain Elliott, in said engagement on Lake Erie, on the said 10th of September, through cowardice, negligence, or disaffection, did not do his utmost endeavour to afford relief to the United States' brig Lawrence.

(Same as to charges 4th and 5th, with the following addition:)

In consequence of which conduct of the said Captain Elliott, the enemy's said ship, the Queen Charlotte, was enabled to unite her force with that of the Detroit against the Lawrence; instead of preventing which, or affording any assistance to said brig Lawrence, the said Captain Elliott left that vessel, her officers and crew (eighty-three of whom were killed or wounded), a sacrifice to the enemy, although his, the said Captain Elliott's, vessel remained perfectly uninjured, with not more than one or two of his men (if any) wounded while Captain Elliott continued on board of her.

In the battle of the 10th September, 1813, on Lake Erie, between the American squadron commanded by Commodore Perry, and the British squadron under Commodore Barclay, the action began when the two squadrons were about a mile apart, by a firing commenced by the enemy; the signal having been made by Commodore Perry for our vessels to engage as they came up, each against the enemy's vessel, as designated in previous orders, which made the Queen Charlotte the antagonist of the Niagara, commanded by Captain Elliott. It was understood by the American officers before the light, that it was Captain Perry's intention to bring the enemy to close action as soon as possible. The Lawrence accordingly closed with the Detroit very soon. The Queen Charlotte made sail for the purpose of assisting the Detroit. The Niagara might have relieved the Lawrence from the Queen Charlotte's fire if she had made proper exertions to bring her to close action; but, by keeping her main-topsail aback and her jib brailed up, she kept at too great a distance from the enemy to do him any material injury, and sustained scarcely any herself until the commodore took command of her, who immediately bore up and passed through the enemy's line, firing both his broadsides with such tremendous effect as compelled him instantly to surrender.

It was the general opinion of the American officers, and expressed with much indignation, that Captain Elliott did not do his duty in the battle as a gallant and faithful officer; inasmuch as he did not bring his vessel, as soon as he might have done, into close action, which circumstance only made the result of the battle for a short time doubtful. Soon after the victory, Captain Elliott's conduct was spoken of, as well in General Harrison's army as in the fleet, with great disapprobation and censure. Captain Perry heard of it, and spoke to me of it one evening; said that he was sorry reports were in circulation so ruinous to Captain Elliott's reputation; wished they might be silenced, and desired me to go on shore to the camp, and do all that I could, with propriety, to counteract them; I did so, accordingly, the next morning. He said the American flag had gained much honour that day, and he wished all his companions in battle to share it with him. Several weeks after this, Captain Perry told me that Captain Elliott wished him to alter that part of his official report which stated that the Niagara did not, until a late period of the engagement, get into close action; and asked me whether I thought that part of his report incorrect, as it had been agreed to leave the question to be decided by two commissioned officers of the fleet (Lieutenant Edwards, who was present, and myself, being the officers selected). I answered, I thought that part of his official report was entirely correct, to which Lieutenant Edwards assented.

Some time after Captain Perry left the lake, and when the squadron was under Captain Elliott's command, he applied to me, and repeatedly urged me to give him a certificate respecting his conduct in the battle. He said that his only reason for wishing one was to have it in his power to calm his wife's uneasiness, who had heard that his conduct had been questioned; and declared to me, upon his honour, that he would make no other use of it than as a means of relieving her unhappiness. Thus delicately and unpleasantly situated, I wrote such a certificate as I thought I might, for such an occasion, venture to give Captain Elliott.

In the action of the 10th September, 1813, on Lake Erie, I was stationed in the wardroom of the Lawrence to act as surgeon. I well recollect that the wounded, from the first of their coming down, complained that the Niagara (commanded by Captain Elliott) did not come up to her station and close with the Queen Charlotte, although he had been ordered by signal; and this complaint was frequently repeated by them till the Lawrence struck, and repeatedly by Lieutenants Brooks, Yarnall, and Claxton. It was at the same time observed that the Caledonia was in close action, while the Niagara, a faster sailer, was quite out of the reach of the enemy. After the action closed, the censures upon Captain Elliott's conduct were so general and severe, not only among the Lawrence's officers, but those of the small vessels, that, in writing to my friends the day following, I did not hesitate to say that Captain Elliott had disgraced himself in the action; and the same sentiment was expressed in the letters of every officer on board who was able to write. These letters were on the point of being sent, when Mr. Hambleton, who had just had a private interview with Commodore Perry, told us the commodore wished us to be silent on Captain Elliott's conduct; that, whatever might have been the appearances during the action, he was then unwilling, after its happy result, to destroy an officer of his rank; and that honour enough had been gained by the action to permit of its being shared by every one engaged in it.

This request of Commodore Perry was complied with as far as was practicable; one of Mr. Yarnall's letters, however, had slipped from his hands before this message was received, and was published.

The second day after the action I attended the wounded of the Niagara (the surgeon of that vessel having been sick), and out of twenty cases, not more than one or two said they were wounded while Captain Elliott was on board the ship. On board all the small vessels, which Captain Elliott brought up towards the close of the action, the number of killed and wounded did not exceed two or three. The number of killed and wounded on board the Lawrence, before she struck, was eighty-three.

In conversation with two officers of the Queen Charlotte a short time after the action, I asked them why the Queen directed her fire wholly upon the Lawrence instead of the Niagara. He replied, "Because the Niagara was so far off we could not injure her."

From all these facts, and others, the officers of the Lawrence and of some of the other vessels felt exceedingly disappointed and displeased with the official report of Commodore Perry, on account of the honourable mention there made of Captain Elliott. We have, nevertheless, been willing to believe that the error proceeded from the best motives.

Midshipman Senat, who commanded one of the small vessels, has repeatedly told me that Captain Elliott had said, in his presence, in Buffalo, that he regretted he did not sacrifice the fleet when it was in his power, and Captain Perry with it.

commanding U. S. sloop Trippe in the action of 10th September, 1813.*

When the American squadron had approached the enemy within about a mile, and the enemy had commenced firing the signal was made by Commodore Perry to "engage as yuo come up, every one against his opponent, in the line as before designated; "agreeably to this signal, the situation of the Niagara should have been abreast of the Queen Charlotte, and within half a cable's length. The Lawrence went gallantly into close action and her example was followed by the Caledonia, Lieutenant Turner; but the Niagara continued to hug the wind, and remained in the position she had taken at the commencement of the action till a few moments previous to Commodore Perry's boarding her. There could not be any rational object in the Niagara's keeping at long shot with the Queen Charlotte, as the amount and description of their force was equal, and, being principally carronades, no effect could be made by them at the distance Captain Elliott kept his ship. From the number of light sails the Niagara had, and there being a leading wind, Captain Elliott might at any period of the action have closed with the enemy, and relieved the Lawrence from the dreadful and destructive fire kept up upon her from the united forces of the Detroit and Queen Charlotte.

It was the general opinion of the officers and men of the squadron, that Captain Elliott did not do his duty in the action of the 10th of September; and that, had he been impelled by a becoming bravery, he would have made greater exertions to have taken an active part in the fight. Great irritation was produced in the fleet in consequence of it, and this opinion continued to be freely expressed till it was made known that Commodore Perry was desirous of protecting Captain Elliott from the effects of such reports. Every exertion was made by Commodore Perry to screen Captain Elliott from the injurious impressions made by his conduct; but the volunteers in the fleet did not pay the same regard to Commodore Perry's wishes as was done by the officers; and many of them, having witnessed the conduct of Captain Elliott, gave full expression to their feelings and opinions respecting him.

It was a received opinion in the fleet, that, previous to Commodore Perry's going on board the Niagara, she had but one man wounded, and that her opponent, the Queen Charlotte, from the account of the British officers, had suffered but very slightly previous to being engaged in close action with Commodore Perry.

When the action closed. Captain Elliott was on board the Somers, and the accounts from that vessel were very unfavourable to Captain Elliott's bravery, as it was reported he beat the captain of the gun very severely with a speaking-trumpet for having laughed at his dodging a shot which passed over him from the enemy.

Washington, January 29th, 1821.

Sir,—To bear testimony against the character of a brother officer is no pleasing task; but there is a paramount obligation that we all owe to our country, which cannot be overlooked but with the implication of personal honour, and to the supremacy of which all private friendship and personal respect must be compelled to bow.

Uninfluenced by other motives, I do now most willingly (but with regret for the occasion) offer my testimony with regard to the conduct of (Captain Jesse D. Elliott, on the 10th day of September, 1813, during the action with the enemy's squadron on Lake Erie. I was the second lieutenant of the brig Lawrence, Commodore Perry's flag vessel, at the time and on the occasion alluded to. I was the officer of the watch at the moment the enemy was first seen on that day, and reported them to Commodore Perry, when our squadron immediately got underweigh and worked out of the bay; after we got out, the wind changed in our favour, and we run down to meet the enemy. After the commencement of the action, Captain Elliott, in the Niagara, instead of keeping on with us, and engaging his opponent as directed, put his helm down and sheered to windward of the Lawrence, leaving the Lawrence exposed to the fire of the enemy's two largest vessels. Some time after the Lawrence had been in close action, and much cut up, I said to Commodore Perry, "that brig (meaning the Niagara) will not help us; see how he keeps off; he will not come to close action." "I'll fetch him up," said Commodore Perry; and immediately ordered his boat. As he left the Lawrence, he said, "If a victory is to be gained, I'll gain it." As soon as he got on board the Niagara, she bore up and run down, and in a short time was in close action between two of the enemy's largest vessels. I was on deck from daylight till after the battle was over; and I believed at the time, and do still most solemnly believe, that Captain Jesse D. Elliott was influenced either by cowardice, and fear prevented him from closing with the enemy, or that he wished to sacrifice the Lawrence, and then claim the victory for himself.

It was my firm belief, at the time Commodore Perry was making out his report of the action, and I believe other officers were of the same opinion, that Commodore Perry endeavoured so to word it as to screen Captain Elliott as much as he could, and that this was done solely from feelings of benevolence.

Respectfully, &c.,

Copy of the affidavit of Lieutenant Stephen Champlin, commanding U. S. schooner Scorpion, in the battle of the 10th September, 1813.

In the action of the 10th of September, 1813, between the American squadron commanded by Commodore Perry, and the British under Commodore Barclay, on Lake Erie, when we were within the distance of a mile from the enemy, who had commenced firing the signal was made by Commodore Perry, "engage as you come up, every one against his opponent, in the line before designated." The situation of the Niagara should have been abreast of the Queen Charlotte, and, of course, as near as she could get, as, previous to the action, I had always understood from Commodore Perry that it was his intention to bring the enemy's fleet to close action in case of a conflict. The Lawrence went into close action in the most gallant style, followed by the Caledonia under the command of Lieutenant D. Turner, who kept her in her station, agreeably to signals. The Queen Charlotte made sail and closed up with the Detroit shortly after the action commenced, and directed her fire at the Lawrence. The Niagara still continued to remain a long way astern, and firing at long shot; a short time before Commodore Perry's going on board of her, she ranged ahead of the Lawrence and to windward of her, bringing the commodore's ship between her and the enemy, when she might have passed to leeward and relieved the Lawrence from their destructive fire. The wind being at that time southeast, and the American squadron steering large (with the exception of the Lawrence, she being at that time entirely disabled, and lying like a log upon the water), the Caledonia took and maintained her station in the line, which was just astern of the commodore, during the whole of the action. It was the opinion of the officers and men of the squadron, that Captain Elliott did not do his duty in the action on that day, and that, had his conduct been that of a brave man, there is no possible reason that can be given why his vessel should not have been brought into close action with the British squadron before Commodore Perry went on board of her.

Great indignation was expressed by the officers in general at the base conduct of Captain Elliott, in neglecting to support the Lawrence, as he ought to have done. But, understanding that the commodore desired to screen him, they forbore to make any remarks publicly upon his conduct. The volunteers in the fleet, however, not being actuated by the same motives which induced those under Commodore Perry's command to remain silent, expressed their feelings without any reserve whatever. At the close of the action Captain Elliott was on board of the Somers, and behaved (as was reported by the officers and crew of that vessel) in a manner totally unbecoming an officer, by beating the captain of the gun severely with a speaking-trumpet for his laughing while he, Captain Elliott, dodged a shot.

On or about the 1st of October, 1813, while commanding the United States' schooner Scorpion, on Lake St. Clair, Captain Elliott came on board: in the course of conversation, the battle of Lake Erie being introduced, he observed "that the officers and men of the Lawrence, including Commodore Perry, were by no means entitled to prize-money; and still farther, that the other officers and men of the squadron were even entitled to prize-money for her, she being a recaptured vessel." He also observed, that in the action he was so far from the enemy that he only fired his 12 pounders during two hours and a half; the reason he assigned was, that he had no signal from the commodore to change his situation: complained much of Commodore Perry's injustice towards him, and said, "He only regretted that he had not sacrificed the fleet when it was in his power to have done so, on that account." He also expressed sentiments to that effect frequently afterward at Buffalo, as I was informed by the citizens, and Midshipman Senat, who was present when the observations were made.

On the 10th of September, 1813, the action on Lake Erie commenced by a firing from the enemy's flagship on the Lawrence at about the distance of a mile. The signal was previously made by Commodore Perry for our vessels to engage as they came up, each against his opponent in the British line, designated by the order of battle, which made the ship Queen Charlotte the antagonist of the

Niagara, commanded by Captain Elliott; it being understood by the commanders of the American vessels that it was the intention of Commodore Perry to bring the enemy to close action as soon as possible. The Lawrence immediately closed with the Detroit, and her example was gallantly followed by the Caledonia, Lieutenant Turner, the Scorpion, and Ariel. Shortly after the commencement of the battle, the enemy's ship. Queen Charlotte, made sail and passed ahead of the opponent of the Caledonia, and opened a destructive fire on the Lawrence, in conjunction with the Detroit; but the Niagara, from some mysterious cause, remained in the position she held at the commencement of the action. The conduct of Captain Elliott, in thus keeping his vessel out of close action, was evidently the cause of the great length of time the action lasted, and made the result for a time doubtful. When the Niagara passed to windward of the Lawrence, she appeared to have sustained little or no injury. After the action closed, the censure on the behaviour of Captain Elliott was general and severe, not only by the officers of the Lawrence, but those of the small vessels; so much so, that the officers did not hesitate to say that Captain Elliott must have been actuated by cowardly or ambitious motives, until it was made known, through Lieutenant Turner, that it was the wish of Commodore Perry to suppress any reports prejudicial to Captain Elliott. In conversation with some of the British officers some time after the action, I heard them give as a reason for the Queen Charlotte's changing her position and firing upon the Lawrence, was in consequence of the Niagara, Captain Elliott, being at so great a distance that the short guns of their vessels could not be used with effect. It was reported that Captain Elliott, at the close of the action, behaved in an unofficer-like manner on board the schooner Somers, by beating a captain of a gun with a trumpet for laughing as he dodged a shot which passed over him from the enemy. It was the received opinion in the fleet that the Niagara had but one or two men wounded on board of her when Commodore Perry took the command, and that she had sustained but slight injury previous to that time. I frequently heard, after Commodore Perry left the station, that Captain Elliott, then in command, had circulated reports, among the citizens as well as officers, respecting the conduct of Commodore Perry immediately after he got on board the Niagara, which were calculated to injure Commodore Perry, and were honourable to himself.

Copy of the affidavit of Captain Thomas Brownell, sailing-master of the United States' schooner Ariel, in the action of the 10th September, 1813.

In the action on the 10th of September, 1813, between the American squadron commanded by Commodore Perry, and the British under Commodore Barclay, on Lake Erie, when we were about a mile distant from the enemy he commenced firing. The signal was made by Commodore Perry, "Engage as you come up, each vessel against her opponent, as previously designated." The situation of the Niagara should have been abreast of the Queen Charlotte, and as near as she could get; as, previous to the action, I had always understood that it was Commodore Perry's intention to bring the enemy to close quarters as soon as possible in case of an action.

The Lawrence went gallantly into close action, but the Niagara continued to keep at a much greater distance astern than when the action commenced.

The Queen Charlotte made sail soon after the action began and closed with the Detroit, for the purpose of directing her fire at the Lawrence in conjunction with the Detroit. The Niagara, by backing her main-topsail and brailing up her jib, was not enabled to fire but at long shots, and with her bow guns, for along time during the action. A few minutes before Commodore Perry went on board the Niagara, she ranged ahead of the Lawrence and to windward of her, bringing the commodore's ship between her and the enemy, when it was in Captain Elliott's power to have passed to leeward and relieved the Lawrence from the destructive fire of the Detroit and Queen Charlotte, the wind being at that time southeast, and the American squadron steering large, with the exception of the Lawrence, she being at that time entirely disabled and unmanageable. It was the opinion of the officers and men of the squadron that Captain Elliott did not do his duty on the 10th of September, and that, had his conduct been that of a brave man, there is no possible reason that can be given why his vessel was not brought into close action with the British squadron long before Commodore Perry went on board of her, she being equal in point of sailing with the Lawrence. Great indignation was expressed by the officers in general at the base conduct of Captain Elliott in neglecting to support the Lawrence; but, understanding from Lieutenant Turner that Commodore Perry wished to screen Captain Elliott, we forbore to make any remarks publicly on his conduct. The volunteers, however, not being actuated by the same motives that induced those under the command of Commodore Perry to remain silent, expressed their feelings without any reserve whatever. At the close of the action Captain Elliott was on board of the schooner Somers, and behaved, as I am told by the officers of that vessel, in a manner altogether unbecoming an officer, by beating a captain of a gun severely with a speaking-trumpet for laughing when he (Captain Elliott) dodged a shot.

He also arrested the commanding officer of that vessel (Sailing-master Almy) for intoxication, and I have frequently been informed, by the officers and men of that vessel, that he was in a perfect state of sobriety, and did everything that a brave man could do to destroy the enemy. I was ordered to that vessel a few hours after the action, and found him perfectly sober, but his feelings much wounded by Captain Elliott's false report. I was told by Lieutenant Champlin and others, that Captain Elliott said he regretted he did not sacrifice the American fleet, and that it was decidedly in his power to have done so. Captain Elliott applied to me for a certificate of his conduct in that action: I told him I could not say anything in his favour, and that I stood ready at any time to give my sentiments before a court of investigation. After the action I was on board the Caledonia, when Captain Bignall, of the British navy, remarked that, had Captain Elliott belonged to the British navy, he would have been hanged.

Mr. Magrath, who signed a letter prejudicial to the character of Captain Perry, told me he would sacrifice his right arm if he could withdraw his name from that paper.

Copy of the affidavit of Lieutenant William V. Taylor, sailing-master of the United States' brig Lawrence, in the action of the 10th of September, 1813.

I am requested to state such facts as came within my knowledge relating to the battle on Lake Erie on the 10th of September, 1813, at which time I was sailing-master on board the Lawrence. Our squadron was then lying in Put-in Bay, with some small islands, of which Snake Island was the chief, to the leeward. At daylight the enemy's squadron was discovered in the northwest from the masthead of the Lawrence, when Commodore Perry immediately ordered the signal made to get under weigh. After we had got under weigh, he asked me if I thought we should be able to work out to windward of the islands in time to gain the weather-gage of the enemy. I replied that I did not think we could, the wind then being at southwest, and light. The commodore then said he would wear ship, and go to leeward of the islands, as he was determined to bring the enemy to battle that day, even if he gave them the weather-gage. The wind, however, at this time hauled to the southward and eastward, and enabled us to clear the islands and keep the weather-gage. At 10 A.M., the enemy, despairing of gaining the wind, hove to in line, with their heads to the westward, at about three leagues distance; the wind then about southeast, and a light breeze. The signal to prepare for action was made from the Lawrence at a quarter before meridian. The enemy's flagship fired a single shot at the Lawrence. Signal was made for each vessel to engage her opponent, as designated in previous orders; which made the Lawrence opposed to the enemy's new ship Detroit, and the Niagara to the Queen Charlotte. Commodore Perry then ordered the word passed by trumpet through Captain Elliott, for the American squadron to close up, as before prescribed, which was at half a cable's length distance. At meridian, finding the enemy within reach of our carronades, opened our fire, and continued nearing them until within cannister range, and were gallantly supported by the Caledonia, Lieutenant Turner, and by the Ariel and Scorpion, both on our weather-bow. Shortly after the action commenced, I observed the Niagara to be a considerable distance astern, with her main-topsail to the mast and her jib brailed up: and I am strongly impressed with the belief that her topgallant-sails were never set until Commodore Perry went on board of her, after the Lawrence had been disabled. Once or twice during the engagement I asked Captain Perry if he observed the conduct of that ship, and the different conduct of the Caledonia. The enemy's ship, Queen Charlotte, taking advantage of the great distance at which the Niagara kept herself, closed with the Detroit, and opened her fire in concert with that ship upon the Lawrence, which proved so destructive, that, by half past one o'clock P.M., we were completely disabled, and our decks covered with killed and wounded; but the animating exertions of Captain Perry kept alive the spirits of the small remnant of our crew, and the action was continued until only one gun could be fired, at which Captain Perry assisted himself. He then determined to quit the Lawrence and take command of the Niagara, which ship, he observed, did not appear to be much injured. The American flag, he said, should not be hauled down from over his head on that day. At the time of Captain Perry's leaving the Lawrence, the Niagara was passing our larboard beam, at from a quarter to half a mile's distance, leaving the Lawrence between that ship and the enemy; the Caledonia at the same time passing our starboard beam, and between us and the enemy. I anxiously watched the course of our noble commander after he left the Lawrence for the Niagara. The enemy had discovered his design, and directed their fire at the boat he was in. He, however, remained standing up in her stern until the entreaties of the men prevailed upon him to sit down. I learned afterward that they had implored him with tears not to expose himself as a mark for the enemy's fire; and finally declared that they would lay on their oars unless he sat down. It was a considerable time, with all the exertions of the boat's crew, before Captain Perry could come up with the Niagara. When he did get on board that ship, he immediately brought her into action; and, passing through the enemy's squadron, poured into them a tremendous fire from both sides. In a few minutes the enemy's vessels surrendered to him and struck their colours, except two small vessels, which attempted to escape, but were pursued and captured.

I had assisted in the equipment of the Niagara as well as the Lawrence. The former ship was in all respects fully equal to the latter in size, in number, weight, and description of guns, in rigging and equipment, and in point of sailing. Before Captain Elliott arrived on Lake Erie, the Niagara was commanded by Lieutenant Turner, and the squadron had already been out one cruise, manned chiefly with volunteer militia. Captain Elliott brought up with him from Ontario from 90 to 100 primemen, the chief part of which he took on board the Niagara, which ship was much better manned than the Lawrence, a great proportion of whose crew was on the sick-list, and most of the remainder not effective men, consisting chiefly of volunteer militia of all descriptions, and exhausted by previous exertions. I was on board the Niagara when Captain Elliott took command of her, and when that part of her crew which came from Ontario first came on board, and I observed that, as they came alongside in their boats, he called out from among them the men previously designated for the different posts and stations about the ship and tops; so that it appeared that his men were already selected. This occasioned my observing to Commodore Perry that the different vessels of the squadron were very unequally manned, in consequence of so great a proportion of the effective men being engrossed by the Niagara alone. He did not think proper, however, to make any alteration. All necessary orders previous to the engagement were distinctly given in writing, and put into the hands of each commander; and the last words of Commodore Perry, to all the officers assembled on the eve of the battle (as was related to me at the time), were, that he could not advise them better than in the words of Lord Nelson: "If you lay your enemy alongside, you cannot be out of your place." After the firing had commenced on the part of the enemy, at about a mile's distance. Commodore Perry gave an order by trumpet for the vessels astern to close up in the line. The Niagara was then near enough to the Lawrence to receive and pass this order. I do not think she was, during the engagement, much nearer to the enemy than she then was, until brought into action by Commodore Perry. It was generally understood that one or two only of her men had then been wounded. If it had been the desire of the commander of the Niagara to have joined in the action, and engaged the Queen Charlotte, as ordered, I know of no cause which could have prevented his so doing. The wind, though light, was favourable, and there was as much of it for the Niagara as for the Lawrence. It was the general opinion of the officers after the battle, that, had the Niagara followed the example of the Lawrence, the enemy would have been compelled to surrender in a much shorter time, and with much less loss on our side. So much indignation was excited by the conduct of the Niagara, that even the seamen broke out in open murmurs: but Commodore Perry requested the officers to silence every complaint against Captain Elliott, saying that sufficient honour had been gained for all; and he was desirous that the public attention might not be attracted to any differences in the fleet. His official account, when read at Erie gave much dissatisfaction to most of the officers. They thought Captain Elliott too honourably mentioned in it.

The foregoing affidavits substantiate most of the charges preferred by Commodore Perry against Captain Elliott. His own evidence and that of other witnesses would necessarily have filled up any vacancies, as he would not have preferred any charge, or elucidated it with any specification, not susceptible of the most ample proof. With these charges still remaining against him, Commodore Elliott has committed other offences, which have led to his being quite recently found guilty by a court-martial of the following charges: of "oppression and cruelty, and conduct unbecoming an officer;" of "scandalous conduct, tending to the destruction of good morals;" of "inflicting punishment on privates beyond twelve lashes with a cat-of-nine-tails, in violation of the thirtieth article of the section of the act for the better government of the Navy of the United States." Among the specifications of these proved charges, the following being those of the charge of "scandalous conduct, tending to the destruction of good morals," may be offered as a specimen, to aid the reader, in connexion with the affidavits, in estimating the probability of the charges adduced by Commodore Perry, and rating at their proper value Captain Elliott's mad and vindictive denunciations of his magnanimous commander.

Specification first.

For that he, the said Jesse D. Elliott, being in command of the naval forces of the United States in the Mediterranean Sea, did, on or about the eighth of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, in the harbour of Lisbon, accept from a part of the crew of the United States' ship Constitution, then under his command, certain silver plate as a present, the whole or a part of the price of which plate was paid for out of the pay due or becoming due to the subscribers to said present from the United

Specification second.

For that the sum originally subscribed by a part of the crew of the said ship Constitution, to purchase a service of plate to be presented to the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, being sufficient only to purchase one piece, to wit, a tureen, leaving a small balance of less than fifteen dollars in favour of the crew, the said Jesse D. Elliott, being in command as aforesaid, did, on or about the fifth day of January, in the year last aforesaid, at or near Lisbon, authorize Lieutenant William Boerum to purchase two tureens, he, the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, agreeing to pay the difference between the sum subscribed by a part of the crew aforesaid and the price of the said two tureens; and he, the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, did afterward add to said purchase a pitcher and waiter, upon which said pieces of plate he did give the following inscription to be put: "Presented, as a mark of respect, to Commodore J. D. Elliott, of the United States' Navy, by the crew of the Constitution"; "which said inscription was accordingly engraved upon the said two tureens, pitcher, and waiter, when, in truth and in fact, one only of the said pieces of plate had been actually presented by a part of the crew of the Constitution to him, the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott.

Specification third.

For that he, the said Jesse D. Elliott, being in command as aforesaid, did, on the eighth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, and on divers days and times afterward, cause the said four pieces of plate, with the said inscription thereon, to be exhibited in the cabin of the said ship Constitution, thereby holding out to those who saw them that they had all been presented to him, the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, by the crew of the Constitution, when, in truth and in fact, one piece only of said plate had been presented to him, the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, by a part of the crew of said ship.

For that he, the said Jesse D. Elliott, being in command as aforesaid, did, on or about the ninth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, on board the said ship Constitution, and after the said pieces of plate were brought on board the said ship, send for Lieutenant Oscar Bullus, and state to him that the amount subscribed did not come up to the price of the plate purchased, and that he, Captain Elliott, had no doubt, if the crew knew what it was to cost, they would be willing to subscribe the full amount, and carry their intentions into effect, and did then and there propose to Lieutenant Bullus to make it known to the crew, for the purpose of getting the subscription under way; which proposition Lieutenant Bullus respectfully declined, telling him, the said Captain Elliott, that he did not think it would look well in the first lieutenant to interfere in a transaction of that nature.

And that afterward, to wit, on or about the tenth day of the same month, the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, being in command as aforesaid, did employ his secretary, one Thomas Wells, [t]o raise some more money from the crew of the said ship Constitution, in order to pay for the additional price of the plate, as before stated.

And that afterward, to wit, on or about the seventh day of the same month, the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, being in command as aforesaid, did inquire of the said Lieutenant Bullus how the subscription (meaning that which he had employed the said Thomas Wells to raise, as aforesaid) was coming on; Lieutenant Bullus said he would inquire of the master-at arms, which he did; and afterward, to wit, on the twelfth or thirteenth day of the same month, or thereabout, the said master-at-arms brought to Lieutenant Bullus the said second subscription paper, containing nineteen names, and sixty-nine dollars subscribed, which said money was afterward received from the purser of the said ship Constitution, and applied to the payment of the bill for the said four pieces of plate, to wit, the two tureens, pitcher, and waiter.

Specification fifth.

For that he, the said Jesse D. Elliott, being in command as aforesaid, did, for his own private benefit, and without regard to the interests of the service, on or about the thirteenth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, embark and cause to be embarked on board the United States'

ship Constitution, then lying at Mahon, in the island of Minorca, twenty-two animals, consisting of jacks, jennies, horses, mares, and colts, being the property of the said Jesse D. Elliott, which said animals, together with another animal, belonging also to the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, which was taken on board the said ship Constitution at Gibraltar, on or about the twenty-fifth day of the same month, by the orders of the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, were placed in stalls erected on the gun-deck of the said ship, by the orders of the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, and so continued during the voyage of the said ship from Mahon until its arrival in Hampton Roads, on the thirty-first day of July, in the same year, by which scandalous acts and conduct of the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, and by the presence of these animals on board the said ship, and the erection and continuance of the said stalls for their accommodation, by the orders of the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, as aforesaid,

Fourteen guns, seven on each side of the gun-deck, were so encumbered that they could only be run in and run out, and could have been fired only once, but could be neither trained, worked, nor exercised.

A large and important part of the battery of the said ship Constitution was encumbered, the force and efficiency of the ship materially impaired, and the said United States' ship Constitution rendered unequal to sustain the honour of the flag in an emergency, thus sacrificing the interests of the ship, the crew, and the service, to the private interests of him, the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott.

Specification sixth.

For that he, the said Jesse D. Elliott, being in command as aforesaid, did, for his own private benefit, and without regard to the interests of the service, on divers days and times between the tenth day of March and the fifteenth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, employ several of the crew of the said ship Constitution, at the Lazaretto, in the island of Minorca, in taking care of certain horses and asses, the property of the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, and in cutting grass for the food of the said animals.

Specification seventh.

For that he, the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, being in command as aforesaid, did, for his own private benefit, and without regard to the interests of the service, use and cause to be used boards, plank, and nails, canvass and junk, belonging to the United States, in making the stalls, slings, bags, and matting for the accommodation of the said animals, consisting of jacks, jennies, horses, mares, and colts, as aforesaid, so belonging to him, the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott.

Specification eighth.

For that he, the said Captain Jesse D. Elliott, being in command as aforesaid, did, for his own private use and benefit, and without regard to the interests of the service, employ and cause to be employed nine men belonging to the crew of the said ship Constitution exclusively in taking care of the said animals while on board the said ship as aforesaid, the said men being excused from watch and quarters.

The whole of the above specifications were fully proved, with the exception of that part of the eighth specification which states that nine men were excused from watch and quarters, it being proved that only eight were so excused.

We have seen in what manner, during the life of Commodore Perry, his character was assailed by Captain Elliott; the following letter of Commodore Decatur, written two days before his melancholy death, will show what measure of mercy was extended by Captain Elliott to Perry's memory.

Washington, March 20, 1820.

Dear Sir,

I duly received your letter without date, with the papers therein referred to. The notice you propose taking of the circumstances which existed between Commodore Perry and Captain Elliot I think entirely correct, for reasons which you have assigned.

Captain Elliot has procured other certificates than those to which you refer, and he has shown such certificates, which strike directly at the character of Commodore Perry; certificates from common seamen, stating that Commodore Perry was entirely unmanned, and betrayed the strongest symptoms of personal cowardice when he joined the vessel which Captain Elliot commanded. Those certificates were shown to a friend of mine at Norfolk, who observed to Captain Elliot that he thought the exhibition of them calculated rather to injure himself than Commodore Perry. He will, no doubt, continue to exhibit them wherever he thinks he can to the injury of Commodore Perry, or the exaltation of his own character. Such certificates, in my opinion, can in no degree affect the high character left by Commodore Perry to his country and his friends; no unprejudiced man who knew him can believe them. I have repelled every insinuation to his prejudice, and shall continue to do so. It is, perhaps, due to his memory, it is due to the nation, that a full and faithful disclosure of all the facts in the case should be made.

I am, with great respect,
Sir, your most obedient servant,
Stephen Decatur.

B. Hazard, Esq., Newport, R. I.

-----

It may, in conclusion, be stated, in justice to, and for the benefit of Commodore Elliott alone, that in his biography he has ceased to assail the courage and conduct of Commodore Perry; and that, while still claiming for himself the chief credit of the victory on Lake Erie, he causes Perry to be spoken of as "that departed hero."

Since the first publication of these volumes, the writer has received a letter from Commander W. V. Taylor, who has recently returned from service abroad, containing a number of interesting anecdotes relative to the events on Lake Erie. Not being able to introduce them in their proper places in the text, on account of the work being stereo typed, they are here annexed.

"The draught that I took up to Lake Ontario numbered about seventy, officers included. The men were the best body of sailors I ever saw; no difficulty whatever occurred with them on the road; neither was there an instance of drunkenness, except in the case of Tiffany the fifer. They all said they had volunteered to serve under Commodore Perry on Lake Erie, and expected to do so. When detained on Lake Ontario they appeared much affected, some of them even to tears. A few only of the above draught were placed under my charge for Lake Erie. They were principally such as had been named by Commodore Perry for petty officers, waiters, &c., and who, with the officers, scarcely amounted to twenty in number. A few other men from the Rhode Island draught were afterward received; but altogether I should think we had not more than forty of them on Lake Erie."

"When Commodore Perry had made up his mind to leave the Lawrence, he directed me to have a boat manned. I told him that he had only one that would float, the one that had been towing astern during the action, and that she was badly injured by shot. I assisted in hauling her up alongside, and observed to him, when he was about getting into her, that he would have to keep her somewhat on one side to prevent her from filling. He replied, that if she would only take him alongside of the Niagara, it was all he wanted of her. He was asked by several of us to allow us to accompany him; but he said, "No; you must stay on board to take care of the vessel and the wounded."

"There was a young man from Newport, named Wilson Mays, and rated carpenter's mate. He was much reduced by the lake sickness, and was entirely unfit for duty; but, while the crew were going to quarters, he came on deck. He was directed to go below as being too sick to render service; but he remarked that the vessel was short of men, and that he could supply the place of a well man by sitting on the pumps, where he was stationed, and using the sounding-rod.

The poor fellow was killed in that situation. Another young man, on having one arm disabled, held up the other towards the enemy in a threatening manner, saying, "Well! never mind, we can lick you with one hand!"

"John Fox, the acting gunner of the Lawrence during the engagement, saw the candle from the light room fall on the floor of the filling-room among the loose powder, where it had been forced by a cannon-ball. He instantly caught the lighted wick between his fingers and fortunately extinguished it."

The writer was not aware, when mentioning the re-enforcement which was furnished by General Harrison to Perry shortly before the battle on Lake Erie, that the soldiers were accompanied by three officers, who, at the head of their men, did good service during the action. They were Lieutenant Robert Anderson, of the twenty-eighth Infantry, who was stationed on board the Ariel, and second Lieutenants James Blair and John Henderson, of the same regiment, who were stationed on board the Trippe.

While adding the foregoing particulars, the writer has been placed in possession of the following narrative of the battle of Lake Erie, prepared for this work by the late gallant and amiable Commodore Thomas Holdup Stevens, very shortly before his sudden and deeply-lamented death. It is published in justice to the commanders of the small vessels astern of the line, whom, it will be remembered. Commodore Perry omitted to notice formally in his official report, in consequence of Captain Elliott having represented that they were not making their best efforts to get into action, and especially in justice to Commodore Stevens, who will long be remembered in the service as a noble specimen of the generous, free-hearted, and chivalrous officer.

"The morning of the 10th of September, 1813, found the American fleet, under the command of Commodore O. H. Perry, at anchor in Put-in-Bay. At daylight the signal was made from the flag vessel, the Lawrence, "discovering an enemy's fleet;" and, as soon as it was answered by the vessels of the squadron, "under-weigh to get" was displayed from the Lawrence, and was obeyed with the greatest alacrity. The wind at this time was from the southwest, light and baffling, which prevented us from weathering the island in our way, and continued so until about 10A.M., when it hauled to the southeast, which enabled us to clear the island. On standing out into the lake we discovered the English squadron, about eight miles to leeward, hove to in a "line ahead." All sail was now made by us to close with the enemy; the square-rigged vessels carrying steering-sails, lower and aloft, and the others using their sweeps: the wind at this time was light, but the lofty sails of the three brigs, and the better equipment of the Ariel and Scorpion, enabled them to fan away from the residue of the squadron, who were left some distance astern. The headmost vessels continued gradually to near the enemy until about fifteen minutes before meridian, when the Lawrence, being about a mile off the weather beam of the English commodore, a single shot was discharged from his ship, the Detroit, which was shortly followed by the discharge of his broadside, and then, in quick succession, by those of the whole of his squadron, as they could bring their broadsides to bear on the Lawrence. At this moment the motto-flag, "Don't give up the Ship," was hoisted at the fore, and the battle-signal was flung out at the main, "engage as you come up, every one against his opponent, in the line as before designated." This signal had been established a few days previous to the action, and designated particularly by name the vessels of our squadron which should attack the vessels of the English squadron, also named. A slight alteration was here made by Commodore Perry, the Ariel and Scorpion being directed to act on his weather bow instead of the place previously assigned them in the line. The leading vessels were then the Scorpion ahead, the Ariel just on the weather bow of the commodore, next the Lawrence, astern of her the Caledonia, and then the Niagara, all close together at this time, I should judge within hailing distance. The residue of the squadron, consisting of the Somers, Tigress, Porcupine, and Trippe, were some distance astern, probably a mile or more, all using their sweeps, and making every effort to get into their assigned positions. Shortly after meridian the Scorpion opened her fire on the enemy, and was immediately supported by the Ariel; the Lawrence continued edging down towards the enemy, and, soon after, the action commenced between her, supported by these two vessels, and the English squadron. The Caledonia and Niagara, shortly after this, opened their fire on the enemy. About twenty minutes after the action commenced, the Caledonia put her helm up, ran down upon the English squadron, and when within good canister range, brought to abreast of her opponent, the Hunter, in the line, and opened a spirited and heavy fire. The gunboats astern had now got within long range, and began to fire, though still using their sweeps, and gradually closing towards that part of the rear of the English line where the Caledonia was engaged: about one o'clock they had approached near enough to the Caledonia to make her the leading vessel of the leeward line of our squadron; the Trippe, under my command, taking a position astern, the Tigress on the starboard quarter, and the Somers and Porcupine on the larboard bow of the Trippe. The action now became very general and severe between the two squadrons. The Lawrence, lying about a beam off the English squadron, with the Ariel and Scorpion on her weather bow, was hotly engaged—almost the whole united force of the English appeared to be directed against this devoted vessel: the Niagara lay some distance to windward, firing her long twelve-pounders. The Caledonia, with the gunboats clustered around her, was, with them, keeping up a heavy and well-directed fire at the Lady Provost, Hunter, and Little Belt, and occasionally firing into the heavy ships. The battle continued to rage with great fury; the Caledonia and gunboats firing round-shot, which was evidently doing great destruction: the rapid fire of the Caledonia soon expended the greater portion of her cartridges, and three times during the action I supplied her with them. About two o'clock the firing on board the Lawrence began to slacken, the English keeping their fire up on her with great spirit, and our other vessels firing with equal resolution, till about half past two, when one universal shout from the English squadron gave us the intimation that the Lawrence had ceased to fire. At this moment a boat was seen pulling from the Lawrence towards the Niagara, which vessel was standing on to windward of the Lawrence: the Niagara, upon the boat reaching her, bore up (with the signal for close action at the main) under topsails, foresail, and foretop-gallant-sail; the main on the cap, to let the signal fly out; the wind had now freshened to a good working breeze, which rendered the sweeps useless, and the vessels of our squadron had all answered the signal. About this time, the English squadron, which had been hove to all the action, filled away, and I was so strongly impressed with the belief that they intended to tack and cut off the smaller vessels, that I hailed Conklin, and cautioned him to look out, and be prepared to haul by the wind. At this time I perceived a boat on my weather bow, and, supposing it was one from the Caledonia (which vessel I had already supplied three times with cartridges), I brought the Trippe to, when Captain Elliott came alongside to windward, and directed me to go within half pistol-shot of the enemy, and commence using grape and canister (we had previously to this been firing round-shot most effectively), and immediately pulled off. I instantly bore up, and drew up on the starboard beam of the Caledonia, between her and the enemy : Turner ordered me to get out of his way; I replied that I should not; he then hailed to say that if I did not he would fire through me; I replied, 'fireaway!' which he did through his own foresail and my jib, carrying it almost all away. We ran close under the stern of the Detroit, the Queen Charlotte on our starboard quarter, within hailing distance, where we continued the action until I was hailed by the commanding officer of the Queen Charlotte to say he had struck, and wished to know if we meant to sink him. I ceased firing, and hailed Champlin, who by this time had got close to me, to do so also, and to pass the word to the vessels astern: the firing of the Niagara, ahead of the English line, continued for a few minutes longer, and when it ceased and the smoke cleared away, we discovered the Lady Provost on our larboard beam: the Caledonia and the Trippe hauled out for her; but soon perceiving by their gestures that they had surrendered, I left Turner to take possession, and pushed on with Champlin in pursuit of the Little Belt, which soon after surrendered. At this time the flags of the English squadron were all down, and the vessels of the two squadrons were speedily brought to an anchor."

APPENDIX TO THE FIFTH EDITION.

Soon after the original publication of the present work in 1840, Mr. J. Fennimore Cooper, author of the Naval History of the United States, took occasion to put the public on its guard against what he alleged to be the inaccuracy of that part of my work which related to the battle of Lake Erie, and to request a suspension of opinion until he could more fully exhibit this inaccuracy in a pamphlet which he proposed to publish.

After brooding during this long interval over the fancied injustice done to his Naval History by two other gentlemen who had unfavourably criticised a particular portion of his work, and by myself, and exercising his ingenuity, which is not inconsiderable, in endeavouring to disprove the allegations of partiality in his account of the battle of Lake Erie, which had been brought against him, Mr. Cooper has at length come forth with more than a hundred pages of special pleading, sophistry, and venomous abuse. With regard to my own share of Mr. Cooper's vituperation, I should abstain from replying to it, if I did not apprehend that my silence might be received as an acquiescence in Mr. Cooper's extraordinary views of the battle of Lake Erie, or an admission that his arguments carried any force with them.

It does, indeed, seem like an insult to common sense, as well as an imputation against the uprightness of public opinion, to multiply words in proving that the Niagara, commanded by Captain Elliott, did not do her duty in the battle of Lake Erie, when the world is in possession of the undeniable facts that the Lawrence and Niagara were vessels of equal force and speed; that each had a designated antagonist in the British squadron; that they were within hail of each other when the action commenced; that the Lawrence immediately bore down, ordering the other vessels to follow her, and engaged at close quarters, where she was assailed by her own antagonist and that of the Niagara, and reduced to a wreck, suffering a carnage unparalleled in the annals of naval warfare, while the Niagara remained at long shot, firing only her two long guns, during two hours and a half, and received very little injury, until Perry abandoned his own disabled vessel, went on board of the Niagara, and carried her into close action. But the subtle and ingenious sophistry of Mr. Cooper has so obscured the subject, and his presumptuous interpretation of the rules of naval tactics has thrown so many stumbling-blocks in the way of lands-men, that it becomes expedient to clear away his artful mystification, and expose the facts in their naked and true character to the eyes of those, if any, whom he may have succeeded in bewildering.

I alleged, both in the article in the North American Review, in 1839, to which a portion of Mr. Cooper's pamphlet refers, and in the Life of Perry, that Mr. Cooper had disparaged the victory of Lake Erie generally, and the extraordinary heroism of Perry in achieving it, while, on the contrary, he had exaggerated the services and suppressed the delinquency of Captain Elliott. Any American who has read the Naval History, as Mr. Cooper calls it, must have observed how studiously all the operations on Lake Erie are kept down; how small an affair the victory is reduced to, and how inconsiderable, comparatively with the general conception of the navy and the whole country, the agency of Perry in achieving it is made to appear. Nor can he fail to have noted the anxiety to bring more conspicuously forward in comparison the victory on Lake Champlain, glorious enough in itself without the attempt unduly to exalt it; greater 'prominence is even attempted to be given to the undecisive operations on Lake Ontario. Little is said by Mr. Cooper of the extraordinary efforts of Perry in preparing his squadron on Lake Erie; of the indomitable heroism with which he fought the Lawrence; of the matchless display of resources in difficulty by which, when the Lawrence, abandoned by her consort the Niagara, was reduced to a wreck incapable of farther resistance, he retrieved the day, by removing, in the height of the action, to the Niagara, and bearing down with her into the midst of the enemy's squadron.

This act of Perry's had attracted, in a peculiar manner, the popular admiration. In admiring the act, the people, wiser than Mr. Cooper supposes them, took into consideration the whole scene, with all its attendant circumstances the Lawrence overpowered and wrecked after Perry had accomplished his whole duty as her commander; the victory to all appearance lost, and yet Perry, surrounded by the wreck of his ship and the almost universal carnage of his comrades, still believing in the possibility of victory, and, strong in this belief, removing under the guns of the opposing squadron to the Niagara, and bringing her down, fresh and uninjured, into the midst of his enemies, to realize the victory he had heroically determined to win. Popular opinion could appreciate and admire this, though sneered at by Mr. Cooper in the following artful note, so well framed to disparage Perry and magnify Elliott. "Popular opinion, which is too apt to confound distinctions in such matters, usually attaches the idea of more gallantry to the mere act of passing in a boat from one vessel to another during the action, than in fighting on a vessel's deck. This was the least of Perry's merits. Captain Elliott was much longer in the same boat, and passed nearly through the whole line twice."

To Mr. Cooper, this act of Perry in leaving the Lawrence after she had been reduced to a wreck under his feet, in order to renew the action in the Niagara, still fresh and without material injury, after the battle had lasted two hours and a half, seems but a small affair. One might suppose that this shifting a commander-in-chief's flag, in order to continue an engagement, was a very common occurrence in naval war. Let us inquire how common. Going back to the time of the Duke of York, afterward James II., who is said to have introduced naval signals and the system of naval engagements in the line of battle, we find it related by Paul Hoste, that the duke, in 1672, when in command of the allied English and French fleets, during an engagement with the Dutch fleet under De Ruyter, twice shifted his flag to continue the engagement, one of his ships having been destroyed by a fire-ship, the other disabled by the loss of her main-topmast. So, in the series of battles of four days' duration which took place between the English fleet under the celebrated Monk, duke of Albemarle, and Prince Rupert, and the Dutch under De Ruyter and the younger Van Tromp, we find De Ruyter three times shifting his flag from burning or disabled ships to continue the action in fresh ones. And on another occasion, Sir Edward Sprague and Van Tromp being opposed to each other, both abandoned their disabled ships to continue the engagement in others; and Sir Edward Sprague, having had his second ship disabled by the loss of her main-mast, was on his way in his barge to a third ship, when, the boat being struck by a cannonball, he gloriously terminated his career in the performance of duty. In Boscawen's battle with the French, under De la Clue, in 1759, Boscawen, having lost his mizen-mast and fore and main topsail yards, after half an hour's engagement with the French admiral's ship, he shifted his flag to a fresh ship, and engaged and captured another ship of the enemy. In allusion to this subject of a commander-in-chiefs shifting his flag from a disabled to a fresh ship, to continue an engagement, which Admiral Ekins justly considers a "noble proof of heroism," and commends accordingly, he says, "We have but one instance, since the time of Boscawen, of a commanding officer's shifting his flag to continue the engagement—that of Commodore Nelson, on the 14th of February; but several for the accomplishment of a particular purpose." In Sir John Jervis's battle, on the 14th of February, 1797, Nelson, observing the Spanish van in the act of bearing up to join a division of their fleet, which had been separated from the body of it, wore his ship, the Captain, instead of obeying the admiral's signal to tack, by which means he found himself almost immediately engaged, at close quarters, with several of the heaviest of the Spanish ships, and after his ship had become disabled, he ordered her laid aboard the ships of the enemy, which were foul of each other, and carried them by boarding. Not satisfied with what he had thus accomplished, he left the Captain with her prizes, and, repairing on board the Minerva frigate, directed her captain to take him to the first ship which he could reach that was closely engaged with the enemy. But, before he could accomplish this noble intention of shifting his flag and continuing the engagement, the signal was made from the admiral to discontinue it, and Nelson repaired on board the admiral's ship, the Victory, and was cordially received. It appears, then, that while one British admiral, at least—Admiral Knowles, in his battle with a Spanish squadron, under Admiral Reggio, in 1748—has been censured for failing to shift his flag when his ship had been disabled and beaten out of the line, there has been but a solitary instance in the British navy since Boscawen, of a flag officer removing from a disabled ship in order to continue the action; and that, in this instance, it occurred in the case of Nelson, and, on account of the discontinuance of the action, was attended with no results. Yet this achievement, but once attempted in the British navy during near a century of almost perpetual war, having been carried triumphantly into effect by Perry, under circumstances as critical as ever occurred in battle, and having resulted in a victory which, but for that inspiration of heroism, would have been the enemy's instead of ours, awakens no admiration in the breast of Mr. Cooper; of that individual whose peculiar notions of chivalry, when himself an officer in the American navy, indicated the near approach of war with England as a fit season for abandoning the service of his country.

It is perfectly well known to the navy and to the country, that the Niagara, within hail of the Lawrence when the action commenced, and in every respect similar to the Lawrence in equipment and speed, did not make sail with her, and accompany her down towards the enemy's line: instead of making all sail as the Lawrence did, she brought by the wind under topsails, brailing up her jib and laying her main-topsail to the mast, sheering to windward of the Lawrence and Caledonia, so as to place them partially between her and her antagonist. By Captain Elliott's own admission to Mr., now Commander Champlin, on Lake St. Clair, soon after the battle on Lake Erie, added to the testimony of many witnesses, it is known that the Niagara was not near enough to the enemy, during the first two and a half hours of the action, to fire anything but her long twelve-pounders. This undeniable fact receives the best possible confirmation that the case affords from the official report of Captain Barclay, dated only the second day after the battle. "The other brig of the enemy, apparently destined to engage the Queen Charlotte, supported in like manner by two schooners, kept so far to windward as to render the Queen Charlotte's twenty-four-pounder carronades useless." Yet nothing is said in Mr. Cooper's account of the battle in his Naval History of the Niagara's main-topsail being aback, nothing of her failing to run down in company with the Lawrence, and engage her designated antagonist, the Queen Charlotte, as quickly and as closely as the Lawrence had engaged hers, the Detroit. He intimates, indeed, that the two brigs had only been able to get into close action together quite near the close of the battle, when he says, "the lightness of the wind preventing either of the two largest of the American vessels from profiting by their peculiar mode of efficiency until quite near the close of the engagement." Yet sometime before, in describing the early part of the action, he says, "the American brig—the Lawrence—endeavoured to close, and did succeed in getting within reach of cannister." It will require the boasted logic of Mr. Cooper to reconcile this contradiction, though no doubt he will succeed in doing it to his own satisfaction.

In a note to the Life of Perry, I had said, "Another gross delusion, practised by the historian and endorsed by the reviewer,<sup>1</sup> who claims for it Mr. Cooper's sanction, because he has not contradicted it, is in assigning to our squadron a great superiority of metal, because the weight of shot thrown by our ships at a broadside was greatly superior to theirs. This superiority grew out of the fact of their having no fewer than thirty-five long guns, while we had only fifteen. Now, the weight of long guns is to carronades of equal calibre more than in the proportion of three to one. How, then, could they hope to exceed us as thirty-five to fifteen in the number of long guns, and yet equal us in weight of shot a broadside?"

In meeting this passing objection of mine to his Naval History, Mr. Cooper takes occasion, in his pamphlet, to re-mark: "It suited Captain Mackenzie to parade the fifty-four to the sixty-three, but it did not suit me. In order to prove that my forbearance was more just than his boasting of the apparent disparity, I now give the official account of the metal of both parties." Mr. Cooper then gives the English official account of the relative forces, showing that our fifty-four guns, chiefly carronades, threw fourteen hundred and eighty pounds of shot at a double broadside, while the sixty-three of the English only threw eight hundred and fifty-one pounds. He leaves the impression that Perry had by so much the superiority. He makes no allusion, in summing up, to the important facts that the greater part of the English guns were long guns, while the greater part of ours were carronades, and that batteries are estimated by their weight of metal, and not by the weight of shot thrown or calibre. Thus, supposing two vessels, equal in other respects, to have been armed during the last war, one with ten long nines, throwing ninety pounds of shot at a broad-side, and the other with ten thirty-two-pounder carronades, throwing three hundred and twenty pounds of shot at a broadside, the vessel thus armed with the long guns, though throwing less than a third of the weight of the shot of the one armed with carronades, would have exceeded her in weight of metal as twenty-five to seventeen, and, under circumstances such as those which attended the battle of Lake Erie, fought, except at the very close, at long shot, in efficiency in action. In the tables attached to Sir Howard Douglas's Naval Gunnery, long nines are set down as weighing from twenty-five to thirty-one hundred weight, and thirty-two-pounder carronades as weighing seventeen hundred-weight and fourteen pounds. Since the last war, we have increased the weight of carronades and decreased that of long guns. In the Life of Perry, I took occasion to state that the weight of metal of the two squadrons was as nearly equal as possible, and I have now made a computation of the weight of the guns of the two squadrons founded on the British statement of the relative forces which Mr. Cooper furnishes in his pamphlet, and the result shows the aggregate weight of the American metal to have been twelve hundred and ninety-five hundred weight, and of the British twelve hundred and thirty-two hundred weight. What a different result this shows from Mr. Cooper's eight hundred and fifty-one pounds of shot thrown by the British at a broadside, to the fourteen hundred and eighty pounds thrown by the Americans, and by which he leaves the impression that we were so much the superior! Lest the writer's correction of the injustice which Mr. Cooper has thus attempted to do his own country might not be deemed sufficient, it may be pertinent to introduce here the opinion of Sir Howard Douglas as to the relative efficiency of long guns and short. Of carronades, he says, "At close quarters they are very formidable; but at long ranges they are no match for long guns even of much smaller calibre, and any vessel fitted exclusively with carronades might undoubtedly be destroyed or captured by a vessel of very inferior rate mounting long guns, if her commander knew how to avail himself of the great superiority of his weapons." In the same connexion Sir Howard Douglas calls attention to the fact that Sir James Yeo, in reporting the defeat of the British squadron on Lake Erie, mentioned in strong terms the deficiency of Barclay's squadron in long guns as the cause of its capture. The argument was a good one, but founded on incorrect premises, as the British had thirty-five long guns to our fifteen. Sir Howard Douglas cites the case of the Phoebe and Essex as strongly illustrating the advantage of long guns over short ones. The Phoebe having long eighteens on her main-deck and thirty-two-pounder carronades on the quarter-deck, while the Essex had forty thirty-two-pounder carronades and only six long twelves of the shortest and lightest description. Mr. Cooper himself, in adverting to this action, could understand the difference between long guns and short ones, though, in commenting on the Lake Erie battle in his pamphlet, he could present the comparative weight of shot thrown at a broadside, instead of the weight of metal, as a just measure of the relative force.<sup>2</sup>

Mr. Cooper having in this particular defended himself from the allegation of partiality as between his own country and England, by thus making his partiality more glaring in his pamphlet than it is in his Naval History, in his farther efforts to disparage Perry repeats the same process, as between the battle of Lake Erie and that of Lake Champlain. He tells us "an officer of great experience, one friendly to Perry, who had seen much service in battle, visited the squadrons on Lake Erie and Lake Champlain before they were separated; and he told me that he thought the Lawrence and Niagara, could they have got within effective distance immediately, sufficient to have defeated all of Barclay's force united, especially with a stiff breeze; and, on the other hand, that he thought the Confiance nearly, if not quite, equal to all M'Donough's. I know this is not the doctrine to gain favour; but my aim is truth, and not personal popularity."

Let the reader observe the art with which this extravagant proposition is insinuated: that on Lake Erie two of the American vessels were equal to the whole six of the British, while on Lake Champlain one of the British was "nearly, if not quite, equal" to the whole fourteen of the Americans. He does not base this on any calculation of numbers, or any statement of force, nor does he put it in the form of a deliberate assertion; he yet states it as if he believed it himself, and puts it forward in a form far better suited to commend it to the belief of the reader, supposing the premises to be believed, than his own assertion would have done. The opinion of "an officer who was friendly to Perry and had seen much service in battle," was certainly more likely to be received as evidence than if it had only seemed to come from Mr. Cooper. He mentions, also, at his own suggestion, and as conclusive evidence of the superiority of the British to the Americans on Lake Champlain, that the Confiance was built by the British after our squadron was completed. He says, "In addition to the small vessels they had the previous year, they built a brig, and as soon as the last American vessel was in frame, they laid the keel of a ship. By constructing the latter a great advantage was secured, care being taken, as a matter of course, to make her of a size sufficient to be certain of possessing the greatest force." Now the facts were precisely similar on Lake Erie; the British ship Detroit on that lake having, in like manner to the Confiance on Lake Champlain, been built last. The argument to prove the British superiority on Lake Erie was as good as it was to prove it on Lake Champlain; but Mr. Cooper having written the two accounts under very different influences, did not think proper to use it equally in both cases.

There is something strangely cumulative in Mr. Cooper's obstinacy and wrong headedness. When he has once taken up one of his favourite paradoxes, every time he recurs to it he increases in extravagance and dogmatism. In his Biography of Perry, in Graham's Magazine, written, as he says, "merely to draw a sketch of Perry's acts and character," and which biography, be it said in passing, is taken almost entirely, with the exception of the account of the battle of Lake Erie, from that very Life of Perry which he reviles and disparages, Mr. Cooper takes occasion to say of Perry, "His professional career was short; and though it was distinguished by a victory which led to important results, and which was attended by great success, it was not the victory of unrivalled skill and unsurpassed merit that ill-judged commentators have so strenuously asserted. Compared with the battle of Plattsburgh Bay, as a nautical achievement the victory of Lake Erie must always rank second in the eyes of American seamen, and in the eyes of statesmen, as filling the same place in importance. A mere ad-captandum enumeration of guns can never mislead the intelligent and experienced, and these, when acquainted with the facts, will see that the action of the 10th September was one in which defeat would have been disgrace."

This comparison of Mr. Cooper is brought forward with his characteristic bad taste: its injustice is only equalled by its extravagance, and both are worthy of the author. The victory of Lake Champlain was a truly glorious one. M'Donough did nobly all that the occasion called upon him to do, and had he been placed in circumstances of equal embarrassment with Perry, would doubtless have risen as superior to them as Perry did. He had opportunity to study the position he had to defend, and moor his vessels so as to take every advantage of the localities and strengthen his defences to the utmost. The disparity of force between his squadron and the British was not quite so greatly against him as it was against Perry on Lake Erie. On Lake Erie the British had sixty-three guns to our fifty-four; on Lake Champlain, according to Mr. Cooper, they had one hundred and fifteen or one hundred and sixteen to one hundred and two. To have made the disparity equal, they should have had one hundred and nineteen to one hundred and two. On Lake Erie, the British were formed in line of battle to lee-ward, and the Americans bore down upon them, receiving their fire, which their great superiority of long guns rendered very destructive. On Lake Champlain, the Americans, on the contrary, awaited the advance of the British at anchor, directing on them a raking fire without interruption in attending to maneuvers, and with the precision of stationary batteries, and the British being obliged to shorten sail and anchor under this terrible cannonade before they could return the fire. In one respect the British on Lake Erie had more advantage of position over the Americans than the Americans had over the British on Lake Champlain. Being under way, they could more easily change their position in the line, if it became necessary, than the Americans on Lake Champlain could perform a similar evolution, being at anchor. Moreover, it was easier for them to wear ship and present fresh batteries, as those on the side with which they were fighting became disabled, than it was for the Americans at anchor on Lake Champlain to perform the corresponding manoeuvre by winding. Still, the battle of Lake Champlain was fought under circumstances as favourable to the Americans as that on Lake Erie was in favour of the British. After the Confiance, the flagship of the British, had anchored and sprung her broadside on M'Donough's ship the Saratoga, the Confiance, though greatly crippled, was still, from her superior size, a most formidable antagonist. But the Lawrence, encountering on Lake Erie her own antagonist the Detroit, and the Queen Charlotte, the antagonist of the Niagara, had to sustain a far more unequal contest. The Saratoga lost, in killed and wounded, as stated by Mr. Cooper, fifty-seven out of two hundred and twelve souls composing her complement; the Lawrence, on Lake Erie, had eighty-three killed and wounded out of one hundred and forty-two souls, including upward of thirty sick, who composed her complement. Was it, then, in hard fighting that M'Donough's action bore the palm away from Perry's, as is pretended by Mr. Cooper? If not in hard fighting, in what was it that the advantage of M'Donough was so conspicuous over Perry, that, according to Mr. Cooper, "compared with the battle of Plattsburgh Bay, as a nautical achievement the victory of Lake Erie must always rank second in the eyes of American seamen?" It could only have been in the evolution performed by M'Donough, of winding the Saratoga after all his starboard guns were dismounted, so as to bring the larboard guns to bear on the enemy. Mr. Cooper, in describing the preparations for the battle, states, in his Naval History, that, "as a matter of course, the Americans were anchored with springs; but, not content with this customary arrangement, Captain M'Donough had laid a kedge broad off on each bow of the Saratoga, and brought their hawsers in upon the two quarters, letting them hang in bights under water. This timely precaution gained the victory." And again, in commenting on the battle in the same work, he says, "The winding of the Saratoga under such circumstances, exposed as she was to the raking broadsides of the Confiance and Linnet, especially the latter, was a bold, seamanlike, and masterly manoeuvre, that required unusual decision and fortitude to imagine and execute." For resorting, then, to this simple and obvious expedient, the only one that remained to him to continue the action, and which the Confiance might have imitated by cutting her cable at the hawse and riding by her spring, M'Donough is preferred by Mr. Cooper to a higher place than Perry, who, after fighting the Lawrence as desperately as M'Donough fought the Saratoga, and with far greater comparative loss, removed to the Niagara, and, bearing down with her into the midst of the enemy's squadron, retrieved the day by his own personal exertions. The name of M'Donough is one of the brightest that adorns the history of our navy. Far be it from any one belonging so that corps to imitate Mr. Cooper in his attempt to disparage our illustrious dead. If M'Donough had been placed in the same critical situation with Perry, he would have doubtless been equally distinguished. But he was well sustained by his consorts, and no similar contingency occurred in his engagement to call forth corresponding exertion.

Continuing his spirit of exaggeration in other particulars, we also find Mr. Cooper, in his pamphlet, instead of excusing himself for his attempts, in the Naval History, to disparage the heroism of Perry's removal from the Lawrence to the Niagara, and to elevate Elliott by stating that he had been much longer in the same boat, we find him, in his pamphlet, putting forward such extravagant, yet hollow propositions as the following: "No one can say what Captain Elliott might have done had there been time, and he did, allowing for the difference in time in closing, all that Perry had done, up to the moment when he left his brig—that is to say, he had got as near, or about as near the enemy, as the Lawrence ever got."<sup>3</sup>

This "difference of time in closing" is certainly a very large allowance, amounting to near two hours and a half, the two vessels at the commencement of the action having been within hail. After making this large allowance, Mr. Cooper, in defending his assumption that Captain Elliott brought the Niagara as near the enemy as the Lawrence ever got, comes in contact with the stubborn fact, testified to by the sailing-master of the Lawrence, that, when Commodore Perry left her, the Niagara was on her weather or larboard beam, from a quarter to a half mile off, the enemy being on the starboard beam, of course the Lawrence lay between the Niagara and the enemy. This testimony is corroborated by a part of the testimony of Captain Brevoort, who commanded the marine guard of the Niagara, where he says, "coming near the Lawrence a boat was discovered." This was the boat containing Perry. According to Captain Brevoort, then, when Commodore Perry was discovered approaching the Niagara in his boat, the Niagara was "coming near the Lawrence." The Niagara, then, must have been rather astern than ahead of the Lawrence, though she got farther off on the Lawrence's weather bow before Perry reached her. Yet Mr. Cooper, while furnishing the means of quoting Captain Brevoort so opportunely, puts forward the following theory of his own, in order to controvert the fact that, when Captain Perry got on board the Niagara, the latter was from a quarter to half a mile on the weather beam or bow of the Lawrence, and to prove, on the contrary, that the Niagara was ahead of the Lawrence, and close aboard of the enemy:

"After reading all the testimony, I have little doubt the difficulty can be got over in the following way: The Lawrence was unmanageable; the wind had increased, and she got a stern drift. At this moment all the vessels were in motion, and by canting the head of the Lawrence to lee-ward a little, the Niagara might very well seem to have been on the weather bow, when, in truth, she was ahead as regards the original position. Some of the officers of the Lawrence are said not to have been particularly sagacious, and wounded, occupied, and situated as they were, it is not surprising that they should fall into a mistake on this point. The world itself turns round without millions knowing anything about it."

Here we find Mr. Cooper, one of the few persons in the world who knows that "it turns round," sneering, in the same paragraph, at the sagacity of the officers of the Lawrence, who had so gallantly performed their duty, and giving us the following remarkable specimen of his own, in a theory too purely of his own invention, which he might have made consistent if he had known how to do so. Here he shows us the Lawrence with her head canted to leeward, which was indispensable to the perfection of one part of Mr. Cooper's theory, namely, that of having the Niagara on the weather beam or bow, when, according to him, she should have been ahead, and yet, at the same time, having a stern drift. The rest of the squadron was approaching with the wind abaft the beam, Mr. Champlin says "steering large;" the Lawrence had her head canted to leeward even more than they, bringing the wind still farther aft, yet having, as she must have had, thus placed in a position to accommodate Mr. Cooper, the wind on the quarter, or nearly aft. Mr. Cooper requires her to have "a stern drift," another clear case of "drifting to windward," or, according to Mr. Cooper, of "mutiny against the laws of physics." Mr. Cooper may well plume himself on his sagacity in defining the law of libel so as to calumniate without stint within its limits, while he uses it profitably against those who, in attempting to defend their country and its inhabitants against his calumnies, have not such an exact and calculating perception as he has as to the limits within which safety is to be found. He had better keep to this work, which he certainly understands and profitably practises, than to attempt to illustrate the want of sagacity of navy officers by examples such as these.

Having sneered at the sagacity of the officers of the Lawrence, Mr. Cooper ridicules, with equal self-complacency, the alleged want of nautical skill of Messrs. Burges and Duer. The latter gentleman had been in the navy as well as Mr. Cooper, and is, doubtless, not inferior to him in professional information, though Mr. Cooper takes occasion, with becoming modesty, to say, "I am aware that Dr. Duer was once in the navy, but I doubt if he ever knew the names of the running gear of an Albany sloop." It is only Mr. Cooper who learns seamanship by intuition, and whom one or two cruises make a better sailor than Hull, Chauncey, or Stewart. Both Mr. Burges and Mr. Duer were contending under generous impulses alone in a good cause. They had truth and justice on their side, and could feel the consciousness of expressing their honest sentiments. Mr. Burges had applied the expression "drifted to windward" to the manner in which the Lawrence, when she discontinued the action and hauled out of the line, was left by the rest of the squadron, which were running more large. Of this Mr. Cooper says, "If this were not flat burglary, it was clearly mutiny against the laws of physics." In attempting to annihilate Mr. Duer's seamanship, Mr. Cooper repeats and defends, in his pamphlet, a gross blunder which he had perpetrated in his Naval History, and which Mr. Duer had pointed out. Mr. Cooper had begun by representing the wind at S.E., and the British vessels on the larboard tack, hove to, and, consequently, heading S.S.W. or S.W. by S. Our vessels are represented by Mr. Cooper as steering S.W. or S.W. by W. at the time the Niagara passed the Lawrence. He then goes on to say, "The British vessels having filled, and the wind beginning to increase, the two squadrons moved slowly ahead, the Lawrence necessarily dropping astern, and partially out of the combat. At this moment the Niagara passed to the westward, a short distance to the windward of the Lawrence, steering for the head of the enemy's line, and the Caledonia followed to lee-ward." Thus Mr. Cooper makes the Niagara pass the Lawrence to the westward and to windward, when the wind being S.E., the westward was necessarily to leeward, and is himself guilty of the "mutiny against the law of physics" which he condemns in Mr. Burges. In his pamphlet, indeed, he attempts to make it appear that he meant the word "passed," as applied by him to the Niagara's passing the Lawrence, to have the signification of steered or stood. But as the Niagara, even by his own statement, did not steer farther west than S.W. by W., his explanation only increases the absurdity. The truth is that Mr. Cooper, in his own estimation, cannot be wrong even by accident; and the defence of paradoxes is nearer to his heart than the acknowledgment of truth.

But the rarest specimen that we have of Mr. Cooper's seamanship is furnished us in his Biography of Perry, in Graham's Magazine, where he attempts to illustrate the battle of Lake Erie, fought under way, by reference to that of Lake Champlain, fought by vessels at anchor, and to prove that there must have been a dead calm on Lake Erie, because the Lawrence did not drift into the enemy's line after she was disabled, as the British schooner Chubb, on Lake Champlain, drifted into the American line. In order to enable the reader who is not a seaman to judge of the congruity and logic of Mr. Cooper's reasoning, it should be premised that, on Lake Erie, the vessels of both squadrons being under way, were subject, in a common manner, to the agency of winds and currents, where as, on Lake Champlain, the Chubb was adrift, and the American line, into which she was carried, was at anchor. "It is physically impossible that a vessel, with her sails loose, should not drift a quarter of a mile in an hour, had there been even a two-knot breeze. The want of this drift, which would have carried the Lawrence directly down into the English line had it existed, effectually shows, then, that there must have been a considerable period of the action in which there was little or no wind, and corroborates the direct testimony that has been given on this point," and the subject is continued after the following fashion, in a note: "In the battle of Plattsburg Bay, which took place the succeeding year, the wind was so light and baffling, that the British anchored before they got as close as they had intended to go. Still, one of their vessels, the Chubb, was crippled, and she drifted into the American line, in the first half hour of the engagement. The distance this vessel actually drifted, under such circumstances, was about as far as that at which Perry engaged the enemy, proving that the latter must also have drifted an equal distance after he was disabled, had there been any wind." And here we take leave of Mr. Cooper's seaman-ship, according to which, a line of vessels hove to and one at anchor are equally motionless. It may be remarked, however, of his seamanship, that it is quite effective when it is exercising its appropriate functions, and assisting him in his character of a novelist. By crossing the ocean a few times, sufficient notion is obtained of the sea and ships to convey a picturesque impression. Nautical slang and the jargon of the fore-castle are readily caught. But when Mr. Cooper attempts to exhibit himself as a nice nautical critic, it is not strange that he should be betrayed into gross blunders of seamanship, which the writer feels some compunction in exposing. He is aware that this is no inconsiderable offence. To make manifest Mr. Cooper's want of fairness, of justice, of good taste, or of decency, might be forgiven; but to detect his ignorance of seamanship is to touch him to the quick—to wound incurably that vanity which, however excessive on most subjects, has its strong-hold afloat.

But to return to the question of the Niagara having been in close action, as pretended by Mr. Cooper, before Perry went on board of her. We have seen that, when Perry left the Lawrence, the Niagara was, according to the sailing-master of the Lawrence, from a quarter to half a mile on the weather-beam of the Lawrence, Captain Brevoort's evidence putting her still farther astern, and the Lawrence being, in either case, between the Niagara and the enemy. Down to the time of the Niagara's passing to windward of the Lawrence, two hours and a half after the action had commenced on our part, even Mr. Cooper does not pretend that she was in close action. If, therefore, the Niagara were carried by Captain Elliott into close action, it must have been between the time of Perry's leaving the Lawrence and getting on board of the Niagara. If the Niagara were near half a mile to windward, as is testified by the sailing-master of the Lawrence, the present Captain W. V. Taylor, there was little opportunity for her to get into close action during the fifteen minutes Perry occupied in reaching her. Perry himself stated that, far from being in close action when he got on board of her, she was keeping a course by the wind, which would, in a few minutes, have carried her entirely out of the action, to prevent which, he first hove to, and immediately after put his helm up, and kept away eight points or a whole right angle.

Again, if the Niagara was in close action with the Detroit and Queen Charlotte when Perry got on board of her, as Mr. Cooper pretends, and the Lawrence had dropped out of action, as he also pretends, what occasion was there for the Lawrence to strike at this particular conjuncture? She only struck after Perry got on board of the Niagara. When the few surviving officers and men of the Lawrence, as they watched the course of their beloved and heroic commander, saw him pass in safety over the gangway of the Niagara, they greeted him with three hearty cheers. It was only after this that the colours of the Lawrence were struck to prevent farther needless effusion of blood, as she was incapable of resistance. As the colours of the Lawrence came down, the crews of the British vessels mustered on their weather bulwarks and sent forth prolonged cheers; and, according to the Life of Commodore Elliott, the Detroit commenced lowering her boats to take possession of the Lawrence. Now, if the Niagara were right opposite the Detroit and Queen Charlotte, and close on board of them, as Mr. Cooper pretends, and if the Lawrence had dropped out of the action, as he also pretends, would not the Niagara instead of the Lawrence have drawn their fire? What was to be gained, in such a supposed state of things, by firing at the Lawrence, which was a wreck, and had long since ceased to be formidable? Besides, had she dropped out of the action, and had her place been occupied by the Niagara, the Lawrence would have been out of the range of the enemy's guns, and the Niagara directly in the range of them. The Lawrence could then have received no farther injury, and there could have been no motive or excuse for striking. It could not have been as Mr. Cooper pretends. The Lawrence, when she struck, must have been opposite the Detroit and Queen Charlotte, under their guns, close aboard of them; the Niagara far away to windward, and not yet closely engaged. Upon no other theory than this, supported, as it is, by the weight of testimony and all the concurrent circumstances, can the fact of the Lawrence's striking, to avoid farther destruction of her few surviving officers and men, be accounted for. The general cheers from all the vessels of the British squadron, their crews mustering for the purpose on the weather bulwarks, and the lowering of the Detroit's boats to take possession of the Lawrence, are all wholly inconsistent with the Niagara being at that time in close action; according to Mr. Cooper, "as near, or about as near, as the Lawrence ever got;" or "nearer," as is pretended in the Life of Commodore Elliott. This work, in accounting for the unfavourable testimony of the officers of the British squadron as to Captain Elliott's conduct during the action, says, "They had beaten the first (Commodore Perry), and had taken his ship, and at the very moment when Captain Elliott was bearing down in the Niagara upon the head of the British line, the crew of the Detroit, after giving three cheers, were lowering their boats to take possession of her." It is asserted, then, on behalf of Captain Elliott, that he was still only "bearing down in the Niagara upon the head of the British line," at the time the crew of the Detroit were cheering and lowering their boats on account of the surrender of the Lawrence, which took place after Perry boarded the Niagara; though the same work pretends, in another place, going in this respect a single step farther than Mr. Cooper," that the Lawrence never was in close action, and that the Niagara got nearer to the enemy before Commodore Perry boarded her than the Lawrence had ever been." If, then, the Niagara had been in close action, "as near, or about as near, as the Lawrence ever got," as is asserted by Mr. Cooper, or "nearer," as is pretended on behalf of Commodore Elliott, who will believe that the British crews would have been allowed to quit their guns, give over even for a moment their exertions in loading and firing, and muster on the weather bulwarks to cheer, thus encountering all the additional exposure of life with a twenty-gun brig firing upon her within canister distanced. It must be distinctly remembered, that the Lawrence only struck after Perry had got on board the Niagara, and that it was previous to his thus getting on board of her that Mr. Cooper pretends that Captain Elliott had taken her "abeam of the Detroit and Queen Charlotte, distant from a thousand to fifteen hundred feet, or about as near as the Lawrence ever got."

Let us see how this extravagant pretension, adopted from the Life of Commodore Elliott, corresponds with another of the statements contained in that work, in which the credit of the victory is given to Commodore Elliott on account of his having gone astern and accompanied the small vessels in closing with the enemy. "The whole force of our squadron being now concentrated upon the four large ships of the enemy, they struck soon after, or about thirty minutes after Captain Elliott left the Niagara. Thus were the two squadrons engaged for nearly three hours; our own beginning to fire when distant about a mile and a half, continually approaching nearer, and being in close action about thirty minutes." Thus it is admitted on behalf of Captain Elliott that the squadron, and, consequently, the Niagara, was in close action but thirty minutes, and that the British squadron struck thirty minutes after he left the Niagara. Does not this statement, brought forward on his own behalf, annihilate the pretension of his having ever brought the Niagara into close action?

Mr. Cooper, while strenuously vindicating Captain Elliott throughout, and insisting that he did bring the Niagara into close action before Perry went on board of her, does not pretend to deny that she was out of close action during the two hours and a half that the action had lasted previous to Perry's boarding her; but still he defends the manoeuvres of the Niagara on the ground of Perry's signal at the commencement of the action: "Engage as you come up, everyone against his opponent in the line, as before designated."

Mr. (now commodore) D. Turner, and others, give the signal, "Engage as you come up, each against the enemy's vessel, as designated in previous orders;" but we will suppose that the signal contained the expression "in the line." Mr. Cooper states, "But Commodore Elliott says, and I shall presently show that he says truly, that his senior officer. Captain Perry, had given him a station in the line, astern of the Caledonia; that he enjoined it on him to keep that station, and that it was for him who gave the order to take the responsibility of changing his own line of battle, if circumstances required a change." Again he says, "The enemy had many long guns, and as the Americans came within their reach, they opened principally on the Lawrence, the nearest of the large vessels. Finding he was too slowly and suffering heavily. Perry made sail in the Lawrence, to get the sooner within the reach of his carronades. The witnesses who testify against Captain Elliott evidently think the latter ought to have imitated this manoeuvre, as the wind would have carried the Niagara down as well and as fast as it did the Lawrence. They also appear to think that, as Captain Elliott was directed to engage the Charlotte, which ship shifted her berth a short distance farther to the westward within the first half hour, that it was his duty to follow her at all hazards. They overlook the all-important fact that Captain Perry had formally laid down a line of battle; that he had 'enjoined it on the commanders to preserve their stations in the line;' that the orders to engage different vessels meant to fire at those vessels from the line, and that the first object was to preserve the line as given, which alone could give concentration and order to the attack. If Perry led ahead of his own order of battle, he was irresponsible, but others would not have been."

Mr. Cooper having thus given Captain Elliott credit for not having taken the responsibility of breaking the line in order to run to leeward of the Caledonia and engage his designated opponent, on the very next page gives him credit for taking the responsibility in running to windward of her, and placing her as well as the Lawrence between him and the enemy. "After a time Captain Elliott determined to pass the Caledonia on his own responsibility. He says he thought Perry must have been killed." Why did Captain Elliott think Perry must be killed? Was it because the Lawrence had been near two hours and a half in close action with her own antagonist the Detroit, and with the Queen Charlotte, the antagonist of the Niagara? Why might he not have assumed that responsibility earlier, on the plea that, if he did not seek out his antagonist and relieve the Lawrence of her fire, that Perry would be killed? But, having "determined to pass the Caledonia on his own responsibility," why did not Captain Elliott, if his object was close action and to relieve the Lawrence, go to leeward of the Caledonia and the Lawrence? The enemy was to lee-ward. By going to leeward he placed his fresh vessel between the Lawrence and the enemy, thus protecting the Lawrence and assailing the enemy, while by going to windward of both, those vessels at the same time became a protection to his vessel from the shot of the enemy, and he was cut off from the ability to use his battery on the enemy. It is said in defence of Captain Elliott in his life, that "he once thought of passing to leeward and breaking the British line; but, on consulting with Mr. Magrath, an officer of great coolness, he came to the just conclusion that such a movement would be destructive." It would have been well for Captain Elliott had he followed his own impulse, instead of yielding, at so critical a moment, to the irresponsible suggestion of his purser. The line of duty in such a case is so obvious, that it seems an insult to common sense to enlarge upon it; yet a remark of Lord Rodney, on an occurrence in the unfortunate battle of Admiral Byng off Minorca in 1756, is so directly applicable to the case of the Niagara, that I cannot forego the impulse to quote it. The circumstances were these: one of the ships, the Intrepid, having been disabled by the loss of her foretopmast, created an obstruction in the line which delayed the ships astern from getting up to support the ships ahead, which were sustaining the whole fire of the enemy's line in passing. Some of the ships passed to windward and some to leeward of the Intrepid. Lord Rodney, in adverting to this occasion in a note to Clerk's Naval Tactics, significantly remarks, "They ought all to have gone to leeward, as the enemy were to leeward." If Mr. Cooper had made the note instead of Lord Rodney, it would be that the ships astern should have preserved their stations until ordered out of them. Though there have been few instances of ships in action willingly taking a station so as to place their consorts, whether disabled or otherwise, between themselves and the enemy, there was a brilliant instance in this very battle on Lake Erie, of a young officer, in the headlong ardour of getting up with the enemy, placing himself between that enemy and one of his consorts. The gallant and amiable Lieutenant Thomas Holdup Stevens, who commanded the little sloop Trippe, ran to leeward instead of to windward of the Caledonia, Lieutenant Turner, and took his station on her starboard beam. The scene that followed had better be given in the language of Stevens himself: "Turner ordered me to get out of his way; I replied that I should not; he then hailed, to say that, if I did not, he would fire through me. I replied, 'Fire away!' which he did, through his own foresail and my jib, carrying it almost all away." This scene calls very vividly to mind a similar one, related to have occurred in the battle between Anson and La Jonquiere, off Finisterre, in 1747. The Bristol, Captain Montague, having got up with the French ship Invincible and brought her to action, the Pembroke, Captain Fincher, attempted to get between them, desiring the captain of the Bristol to put his helm a-starboard, or he should be on board of him; to this Captain Montague replied, "Run on board and be d—d; neither you nor any other man shall come between me and my enemy!"

Mr. Cooper has stated, in his pamphlet, the important fact, that "the Queen Charlotte shifted her berth a short distance farther to the westward within the first half hour." He does not, however, account for this fact; neither did he in his Naval History, where it is twice mentioned as follows: "The Lawrence, however, appeared to be the principal aim of the enemy, and before the fire had lasted any material time, the Detroit, Hunter, and Queen Charlotte were directing most of their fire against her." Again he says, "The effect of the cannonade was necessarily to deaden the wind, and for nearly two hours there was very little air. During all this time, the weight of the enemy's fire continued to be directed at the Lawrence; even the Queen Charlotte, having filled, passed the Hunter, and got under the stern of the Detroit, where she kept up a destructive cannonade on this devoted vessel." Mr. Cooper does not give the reason for this important fact; but Captain Barclay does, when he says, in his official report to Sir James Yeo, two days after the action, "The other brig of the enemy, apparently destined to engage the Queen Charlotte, supported in like manner by two schooners, kept so far to windward as to render the Queen Charlotte's twenty-four-pound carronades useless." The officers of the Queen Charlotte assigned also as a cause for firing at the Lawrence instead of the Niagara, "Because the Niagara was so far off we could not injure her."

The purport of the signal made by Perry at the commencement of the action is thus variously given by the officers of the squadron. Lieutenant Turner says, "The signal having been made by Commodore Perry for our vessels to engage as they came up, each against the enemy's vessel, as designated in previous order." Lieutenant Stevens reports, "Engage as you come up, every one against this opponent, in the line as before designated;" and adds, "this signal had been established a few days previous to the action, and designated particularly by name the vessels of our squadron which should attack the vessels of the English squadron also named." This statement of Mr. Stevens effectually connects the signal with the order of battle, assigning to each vessel her particular antagonist. Mr. Champlin has, "Engage as you come up, every one against his opponent, in the line before designated." Mr. Breese says, "Engage as you come up, each against his opponent in the British line, as designated by the order of battle." Mr. Brownell says, "Engage as you come up, each vessel against her opponent, as previously designated;" and Mr. Taylor, "Signal was made for each vessel to engage her opponent, as designated in previous orders." Can any different construction be put upon this than that each vessel should engage her designated opponent? The line referred to in the signal was, doubtless, the British line, and Mr. Breese has it "opponent in the British line, as designated in the order of battle." No one had a better right than Mr. Breese to know the exact words of the signal; as secretary to the commodore, it was his duty to take notes of the action, and, in the absence of any regular signal officer, he doubtless acted in that capacity. Now, shortly before the action, Commodore Perry had issued to the commanders of vessels the following written orders, accompanied by diagrams. First, a line of battle arranging the vessels at a distance of half a cable's length from each other, enjoining upon the commanders to preserve their stations in the line. and, in all cases, to keep as near the Lawrence as possible. Second, an order of attack; in which each vessel of our line was designated to attack a particular vessel in the British line; the Lawrence, in this order, was designated to attack the heaviest ship, the Detroit, and the Niagara was designated to attack the Queen Charlotte. In the diagram the Niagara is drawn broadside and broadside with the Queen Charlotte. At the time when these orders were given to each of the commanders, they were farther expressly instructed that it was the intention of the commodore to bring the enemy to close action as soon as possible, and the last emphatic injunction with which he dismissed them was, "that he could not, in case of difficulty, advise them better than in the words of Lord Nelson, 'If you lay your enemy close alongside, you cannot be out of your place!'"

Now, what construction does the reader suppose Mr. Cooper, the logician, puts on the order, "Engage as you come up, every one against his opponent in the line, as before designated?" He construes it into "fire at those vessels from the line." The italics are his own. Engaging the designated opponent was subordinate, according to Mr. Cooper, to keeping the line. Now, what upright and zealous officer commanding one of these vessels would have failed to consider the engagement of his designated opponent the material part of this order, even without the comprehensive and emphatic commentary of Perry, that his object was to bring the enemy to close action as soon as possible, and if they laid their enemy close alongside, they would not be out of their places? With such a commentary, could there be any doubt as to which way the path of duty lay for the Niagara? Let us leave the answer of the question, not to Mr. Cooper, but to every right-minded officer and every true-hearted citizen.

But there was a practical commentary as to the mode in which the signal, "engage as you come up, every one against his opponent in the line, as before designated," should be obeyed. After the British squadron had been approached near enough to discover the order in which it was arranged, Perry perceived that the Detroit was towards the head of the British line, and the Queen Charlotte towards the centre. Had the American squadron gone into action as it was then formed, the Niagara would have had the Detroit, greatly the heaviest of the enemy's ships, for her antagonist, and the

Lawrence the Queen Charlotte. But the order of attack had designated the Lawrence as the antagonist of the Detroit, and the Niagara of the Queen Charlotte. Perry, therefore, immediately, on making the discovery, remodelled his line by passing ahead of the Niagara so as to get opposite the Detroit, and caused the Niagara so to place himself as to correspond to the station of the Queen Charlotte in the enemy's line. When the Queen Charlotte, soon after the commencement of the action, left her station, because, as stated by her officers, the Niagara was too far off to be reached by the guns of the Queen Charlotte, and, passing the Hunter, joined the Detroit in firing at the Lawrence, was it not clear that the Niagara should at once have imitated the evolution, passed the Caledonia, and laid herself alongside of her antagonist, leaving the Caledonia opposite hers, which was the Hunter? The order of attack, which had been communicated to all the commanders, was an all-sufficient warrant; and if that warrant were not sufficient, there was the order, "in all cases, to keep as near to the commanding officer's vessel as possible;" and, above all, the last solemn injunction, "if you lay your enemy close alongside, you cannot be out of your place."

Mr. Cooper farther says in defence of Captain Elliott for not immediately passing the Caledonia in the Niagara, when the Queen Charlotte passed the Hunter, so as to keep opposite her antagonist, and relieve the Lawrence from the addition of her fire, "The Lawrence, sailing better, left the Caledonia astern, the latter being a merchant brig armed for the cruise. This, necessarily, kept the Niagara astern also, which brig, following directly in the wake of the Caledonia, was obliged to brace her main-topsail sharp aback, in order to prevent going into her. These were the only occasions, while Captain Elliott was in her, that the Niagara had her topsail aback and jib brailed. Captain Perry was present; knew best how much he wanted assistance, and was bound, on every principle of military service, to take the responsibility of changing his own line of battle. If he was not there for such a purpose, when necessary, he was not there for the purpose of commanding in chief. It was clearly his duty to have ordered the Niagara to have passed the Caledonia if circumstances required it; and it was the duty of Captain Elliott to remain where he had been placed, until circumstances induced him to think his commander could not control events. Any other course would have led to the grossest insubordination, and Captain Elliott might have been ruined in the event of an accident." Captain Elliott might have been ruined, in the opinion of Mr. Cooper, by following the opposite course from that which has secured Mr. Cooper's solitary approbation, but not in the opinion of the navy and the country. Mr. Cooper does not seem to be aware that the duty of preserving a vessel's station in the line has reference to other matters than her relative position with reference to her second ahead. If the second ahead drops astern, and cannot keep her station, it is the duty of the next vessel to pass her, otherwise the bad sailing or other disability of one vessel might occasion the delinquency of all astern of her. Mr. Cooper goes so far as to say explicitly, "the Niagara was ordered to remain astern of the Caledonia." No such order was given. There was an order for "the several vessels to keep within half a cable's length of each other, and enjoining it upon the commanders to preserve their stations in the line, and, in all cases, to keep as near to the commanding officer's vessel as possible." The station of the Niagara in the line was, therefore, one cable's length astern of the Lawrence, plus the length of the Caledonia, and whenever, if ever, the Caledonia could not keep her station one half cable's length astern of the Lawrence, it became the duty of the Niagara to pass her; a duty rendered doubly imperative by the injunction, in all case to keep as near to the commanding officer's vessel as possible; a duty farther enforced by the paramount requirement of the order of attack, which constituted the Niagara the designated antagonist of the Queen Charlotte, and sanctioned by the comprehensive justification for any excess of valour, "if you lay your enemy close alongside, you cannot be out of your place."

It is admitted on behalf of Captain Elliott, in the biographical notice of him, evidently written under his auspices, that it was his duty to pass the Caledonia at once after the Queen Charlotte passed the Hunter, and succour the Lawrence from the additional attack of the Queen Charlotte; it is also insisted in that work, in the following explicit manner, that he performed this duty: "So soon as the squadrons, continually approaching, were sufficiently near for carronades to take effect on the hull, the Queen Charlotte left the line, bore away from the fire of the Niagara, and directed her whole battery of carronades upon the Lawrence. Captain Elliott, perceiving this movement, ordered the Caledonia, then directly ahead of the

The officers of the Niagara take the same view of their duty in this emergency, as is evident from the following extract from their letter to the Secretary of the Navy, which shows, also, what their interpretation was of the signal "engage your designated opponent in the line." "At this time the Queen Charlotte was discovered to bear up, and stand away from the Niagara's fire. Captain Elliott ordered the fore and aft main-sail to be hauled out and the jib sheet aft, in order to come up with her, she being the vessel we meant particularly to engage. The Queen Charlotte having gained the Detroit's lee, and the Lawrence gaining ahead, Captain Elliott ordered the Caledonia to bear up and leave us room to close with the Lawrence, which was done, and the action carried on with great vigour and spirit on both sides." So, also, Mr. Magrath states, "Finding the Queen Charlotte to make sail ahead from our fire as we supposed, Captain Elliott hailed the Caledonia, and ordered her helm put up, which was done, and the Niagara passed ahead by filling her main-topsail, and setting the jib and fore and aft main-sail." Mr. Cooper says of me, "He constantly contradicts the best evidence the case allows, on altogether insufficient grounds." Again he says of me, "He constantly contradicts his own witnesses. Captain Mackenzie falls into this childish error constantly." Now Mr. Cooper goes on to say, that "the officers of the Niagara were the best witnesses as to the position of their vessel." Also, "Mr. Magrath was probably the best witness of which the case admitted." And yet we find Mr. Cooper himself flatly contradicting the witnesses whom he thus eulogizes and makes his own; admitting, in conformity with the evidence of which I have made use, and in flat contradiction to the officers of the Niagara, whose evidence he pronounces the best, that the Niagara did not immediately follow and keep alongside of her designated antagonist, the Queen Charlotte, when she closed up astern of the Detroit and opened her fire on the Lawrence, and elaborately justifying Captain Elliott for not doing so on the ground of its being his duty "to remain where he had been placed, until circumstances had induced him to think his commander could not control events." It seems, then, that neither Captain Elliott nor the officers of the Niagara are willing to accept the excuses made for their vessel by Mr. Cooper, but admit that it was her duty to follow and engage the Queen Charlotte and relieve the Lawrence. Mr. Cooper and his witnesses are at direct variance, both as to opinions and as to facts; they contending that they fulfilled their duty in following the vessel they "meant particularly to engage;" he admitting that they did not do so, and that it was not their duty.

It is apparent that, had the Niagara immediately followed and engaged the Queen Charlotte, it would have been no disobedience of orders. But a disobedience of orders, when it proceeds from a noble and generous motive, has often met not merely with forgiveness, but commendation. In the battle off Cape St. Vincent, Sir John Jervis, while engaged with the Spanish fleet on opposite tacks, made signal to tack in succession. Nelson, whose station was in the rear of the British line, perceived that the Spanish van was bearing away before the wind, with the intention of going large, joining a part of their fleet from which they had been separated, and forming a line to leeward. To prevent these results. Nelson disobeyed the signal and wore ship, which brought him almost immediately into action with several of the heaviest of the Spanish ships; and his example being followed by Collingwood and others, the consequence was, that, instead of the ordinary undecisive result of the fleet engagements of the time, four of the Spanish ships were taken. As soon as the action was over, Nelson went on board the admiral's ship, where Sir John Jervis personally received him on the quarter-deck, took him in his arms, and told him he could not sufficiently thank him. So, at the Nile, Nelson had directed his ships to anchor on the outside of the French line, Captain Foley, in the Goliath, outsailing the Zealous, which was at the head of the line, and passing her, conceived the idea of getting between the French and the shore, in the belief that the enemy would not be so well prepared to receive an attack on that side, and that where the French ships had room to swing round, there would be room also for him to anchor. He was followed by five ships, all, in fact, that were ahead of Nelson, who first anchored with the Vanguard on the outside of the French, followed by the rest of his fleet. The willful disobedience of Nelson at Copenhagen, when signal was made for him to discontinue the engagement and haul off, putting his glass to his blind eye when the signal was reported to him, and protesting he did not see it, is familiar to every one. The disobedience which is prompted by an intuitive perception of a critical moment for attacking with advantage, and a chivalrous impulse to seize it, is a very different thing from the disobedience which is committed in withdrawing from battle. It would have been no disobedience for Captain Elliott, when the Queen Charlotte left her station in the line to assail the Lawrence, to have followed her example in the Niagara. The order of attack which made the Niagara the antagonist of the Queen Charlotte, practically explained by the change in the line which took place shortly before the engagement commenced, to render the arrangements of that order of attack complete, would have been ample authority.

We have seen that Mr. Cooper expresses the opinion that Captain Perry, as commander-in-chief, being present, and best knowing how much he wanted assistance, should have ordered the Niagara to pass the Caledonia if circumstances required it, and that, not having done so, it was the duty of Captain Elliott to remain astern of the Caledonia until—when? until a very peculiar period described by Mr. Cooper as follows: "until circumstances induced him to think his commander could not control events." It is true Perry was commander-in-chief of the squadron, but he was also captain of his own ship. As commander-in-chief, he had elaborately explained his views, and especially his intentions to come at once to close quarters, and made every conceivable preparation for the coming engagement. Immediately before the battle began, in farther exercise of his functions as commander-in-chief, he remodelled the line so as to fulfill the provisions of his order of battle. After the battle began, it only remained for every commander to obey the ample orders he had received, to do his whole duty, and, above all, to follow wherever the commander led. When the Lawrence became closely engaged, the whole resources of Perry were devoted to fighting his own vessel. He himself says, in a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, "Having previously to the engagement, given all the orders which I thought necessary to enable every officer to do his duty, and feeling confidence in them all, I was, after it commenced, necessarily too much engaged in the actual scene before me to reflect deliberately upon the cause which could induce Captain Elliott to keep his vessel so distant both from me and the enemy." After the delinquency of the Niagara had thus become obvious, it was the more urgently necessary that the fire of the Lawrence should be sustained by all the exertions that Perry is known to have put forth. If the signal haliards continued rove in the crippled condition of the Lawrence, and signals might be discerned through the smoke that enveloped her, what order could have been conveyed by signal more comprehensive or more appropriate than those already given? "Engage your designated antagonist !" "Lay your enemy alongside!"

But, in addition to the various orders that we have enumerated before the battle, and the signal, after it commenced, for engaging designated antagonists, furnishing Captain Elliott with a sufficient warrant for passing the Caledonia when the Queen Charlotte passed the Hunter, were any warrant necessary for the performance of so obvious a duty, still later in the action, after the Lawrence had made sail to close with the enemy, there was a farther order passed by trumpet for the vessels astern to follow her, which order was responded to and passed by Captain Elliott. His Life thus describes this circumstance: "There was the farther order passed by trumpet for the squadron to close up, which order was responded to and passed by Captain Elliott." In Perry's official report this fact is stated as follows: "At fifteen minutes before twelve the enemy commenced firing: at five minutes before twelve the action commenced on our part. Finding their fire very destructive, owing to their long guns, and it being mostly directed at the Lawrence, I made sail and directed the other vessels to follow for the purpose of closing with the enemy." Captain Elliott's Life thus again alludes to the same important occurrence: "It was this destructive fire from the long guns which caused him (Perry) to bear down for the purpose of closing, and to direct the other ships to follow him." With this distinct verbal order of Perry, and this distinct acknowledgment of it in Captain Elliott's biography staring him in the face, Mr. Cooper can yet reason after the following fashion: "Finding he was approaching too slowly, and suffering heavily, Perry made sail in the Lawrence, to get the sooner within reach of his carronades. The witnesses who testify against Captain Elliott evidently think the latter ought to have imitated this manoeuvre, as the wind would have carried the Niagara down as well and as fast as it did the Lawrence. They also appear to think that, as Captain Elliott was directed to engage the Charlotte, which ship shifted her berth a short distance within the first half hour, it was his duty to follow her at all hazards." The only person who does not appear to be of

And here, by way of farther illustration, it may not be amiss to introduce the speech made to his crew by Captain Elliott, immediately after he had spoken the commodore, when the latter passed him to take his station opposite the Detroit, as testified to before the Court of Inquiry, in 1815, by Midshipman J. B. Montgomery. "Captain Elliott spoke Captain Perry while we were passing to leeward. Captain Elliott mentioned to his crew that it was the commodore's intention to bring the enemy to close action immediately. He told them it was probable we should receive one or two raking fires from the enemy, and advised them to receive it with coolness and not be alarmed. He observed, that we should not commence firing until within musket-shot distance, and then, if every man did his duty, we should flog them in ten minutes. He then ordered them to their quarters." How were these intentions of Perry, as thus explained by Captain Elliott to his crew, and immediately after carried into effect by the Lawrence, fulfilled by the Niagara?

Here, then, we have an order of attack, designating the antagonist of each vessel; we have a solemn injunction of Perry to his captains, before the battle, that he could not advise them, in case of difficulty, better than in the words of Lord Nelson, "If you lay your enemy alongside, you cannot be out of your place." We have a signal for each vessel to engage her opponent; we have an order by trumpet, after the action began, to close up; in the words of Commodore Elliott's Life, "to direct the other ships to follow him." We have the example of the commander-in-chief leading close towards the enemy, yet Mr. Cooper says that the Niagara was not bound to follow the Lawrence into close action; that "the man who reasons thus is no tactician or disciplinarian." Sir George Rodney, in reporting the circumstances of his battle off Martinico, in April, 1780, says, "At fifty-five minutes after eleven, A.M., I made the signal for battle; a few minutes after, the signal that it was my intention to engage close, and of course the admiral's ship to be the example." Mr. Clerk, in noticing the misconduct of Admiral Lestock in the battle off Toulon, in 1744, in which Lestock abandoned his commanding admiral, who bore down with great gallantry to engage the enemy, and lived to malign and persecute the man whom he had betrayed, makes the following judicious remarks, even more applicable to the battle of Lake Erie than the occasion to which it referred: "A general at the head of his troops, and leading them on to action, has long been considered a sufficient signal; and Mr. Mathews, when going down to battle, as admiral in the centre, should have been the example for his whole fleet, whether the signal was given at ten or twelve o'clock; the brave commanders of the Norfolk and Marlborough, his seconds, were of this mind, as has also been Sir George Rodney upon a later occasion. Therefore, every ship which kept her wind, and did not follow the admiral, Mr. Mathews, down to fight the enemy, ought only to be considered as breakers of the line."

Having stated so much in reply to Mr. Cooper's arguments with regard to the battle of Lake Erie, I propose to notice what is more particularly personal to myself in his pamphlet. Abuse of me is, after all, the object of his production. He has made the alleged detection of a very small number of errors in the Life of Perry, only one of which I concede may be indeed an error, the pretext for unmeasured vituperation. The chief of these errors, as pointed out by him, is my allegation that Captain Elliott, after having complained of the injustice of Commodore Perry's official report of the battle of Lake Erie, subsequently, when the finding of the British court-martial on Captain Barclay had made his conduct appear so much more unfavourably, endeavoured to substantiate that report before the Court of Inquiry into his conduct, by making a question as to its accuracy a leading one to almost every witness. Mr. Cooper says, with an exemplified copy of the Court of Inquiry before him, that it was not put by Captain Elliott to a single witness. In the Life of Commodore Elliott is a copy of the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry, which purports to be a complete one. In this copy it appears that the question, as to the correctness of Commodore Perry's official report, was asked of five out of the seven witnesses which were examined. The question appears to have been asked of Lieutenant Nelson Webster by the court; of Lieutenant Yarnall the question was also asked, it does not appear by whom; of Midshipman J. B. Montgomery the question was asked, it does not appear by whom; it is asked of Midshipman Adams, without its appearing by whom; of Lieutenant Forrest it is asked in like manner, without its appearing by whom. The succeeding question in this case was put by the judge-advocate. Some of the questions in this copy of the record are set down as having been asked by the judge-advocate, by the court, or by Captain Elliott. In the single case of Lieutenant Webster it is stated that the question was asked by the court. Is it strange, then, that, without any direct evidence as to whom the questions were asked by, I should have received the impression that they were asked by Captain Elliott? The court held its investigation into the conduct of Captain Elliott at his own request, and the order from the Navy Department distinctly stated that it was given in consequence of its having been informed that the conduct of Captain Elliott had been misrepresented by the proceedings of a court of inquiry in Great Britain, and that "justice to the reputation of Captain Elliott, and to the navy of the United States, required that a true statement of the facts in relation to his conduct on that occasion be exhibited to the world." A very small number of witnesses, chiefly composed of officers of the Niagara, and including neither Perry nor any of the commanders of the other vessels, were summoned. The questions, by whomsoever put, equally tended to the justification of Captain Elliott, and showed a familiarity with information that would seem to have been derived from him; he acquiesced, moreover, in the correctness of the report, and allowed his justification from the British charge of "making away" to rest mainly on the accuracy of Perry's report, which contained no such allegation. Under these circumstances, and without any evidence that these questions were put by any other than Captain Elliott, it is not surprising that I should have fallen into this slight mistake, which the copy of the record in Commodore Elliott's Life does not even now afford the means of correcting. Still, I will not hesitate to make the correction on the faith of Mr. Cooper's statement, and to express my regret at having inadvertently done Captain Elliott injustice in this particular.

With regard to Mr. Cooper's allegation, that I contradict my own witnesses in stating that the first shot was fired by the British flagship Detroit at the Lawrence, at a distance of a mile and a half, whereas those witnesses say that the action began at the distance of a mile, I have to state, that my belief that the two squadrons were not less than one and a half miles apart when the action commenced, was mainly founded on the supposition that the distance could not have been less, when a shot from a long twenty-four-pounder did not take effect. Five minutes elapsed before the Detroit fired again, when the shot did take effect. It was still five minutes later when the Lawrence first fired from her long twelve pounder, after which the Scorpion and Ariel were ordered by trumpet to commence firing with their long guns. I presume it is not likely that the squadrons could have been less than a mile apart when the Lawrence and schooners thus commenced returning the British fire. At meridian, a quarter of an hour after the first shot was fired from the Detroit, at a distance, as I have supposed, from the Lawrence of a mile and a half, the Lawrence luffed-to and fired her carronades of the first division on the starboard side, and finding her shot still did not tell, she bore away again without attempting to fire a carronade until a quarter of an hour later, when, being, as I suppose, with-in half a mile of the enemy, she again rounded-to and fired her whole broadside, and again bore away until within canister range. I think the distance I have mentioned for the first shot of the Detroit corresponds best with the different dates and corresponding occurrences. With the same view of making dates and distances correspond with each other, and the alleged rate of sailing of between two and three knots an hour, I have altered the distance of the two squadrons at ten o'clock, given by Mr. Taylor as nine miles, to six miles; because I could not otherwise account for our squadron, sailing, as it is said to have done, at the rate of two and a half knots, being, at a quarter before meridian, even within a mile and a half of the enemy. If I had stated that the squadrons were nine miles apart at ten o'clock and only one mile apart at a quarter before meridian, that would have involved alone a rate of sailing of more than four and a half knots an hour, without estimating the drift of the British squadron. The British ships were hove-to with their main-topsails to the mast. In order to preserve the line and the respective distances, they must necessarily have been kept ranging ahead by steering a little off, and not been hove dead-to. Under these circumstances, they could not, even with a breeze that had brought the American squadron eight knots in an hour and three quarters, have run and driven together, at the lowest calculation, less than a knot an hour, which would make a mile and three quarters to be added to the eight knots, by which the distance between the two squadrons had been diminished in an hour and three quarters, making, in all, nine and three quarter miles run by our squadron from ten o'clock to a quarter before meridian, or somewhat more than at the rate of five miles an hour. Now, if I had adopted these two statements as being correct, I must have given to our squadron a rate of sailing of more than five knots an hour, and, of course, have annihilated whatever excuse has been put forward for the Niagara's keeping out of close action on the score of want of wind. Yet Mr. Cooper, in investigating this subject, imputes to me a partial motive in altering the distance, when he introduces the subject by saying, "the question connected with the Lake Erie controversy was one purely of distance." I may, on consultation with the surviving officers of the Lake Erie squadron, restore the distances as given by Mr. Taylor, if they, on mature consideration, determine that my statement is erroneous; but, if I do so, I must give to our squadron a rate of sailing of more than five knots an hour, and thereby increase the culpability of the Niagara in not allowing the same wind that carried the Lawrence so quickly and so gallantly into close action, to carry her into it also. This may be a proper place to say, in defence of that Life of Perry which Mr. Cooper sneers at, denounces, and condemns, and the public with it, for reading it, according to his account, so extensively and confidently, though he has himself used it, when it suited his purpose, to the extent almost of piracy, in his own pretended biography of Perry, which might be more properly denominated a defence and eulogy of Elliott, that I have called in vain on many of the surviving officers of the Lake Erie squadron to point out a single error, with a view to its correction, and that they have, on the contrary, borne flattering, and, to me, most grateful testimony to its minute fidelity. Another important objection offered by Mr. Cooper to the Life of Perry is, that I have only made use of the testimony on one side in the controversy about the Niagara's share in the battle of Lake Erie. Mr. Cooper contends that the testimony on the other side, that of the officers of the Niagara, is the best that the case afforded. The commissioned officers of the Niagara undertook, on the 13th of October, 1813, to give a detailed account of the battle of Lake Erie, in a letter to the Secretary of the Navy: it is too long for insertion, but its preamble may be given as a specimen of the impulse under which it was written. "We have, with regret, seen the condensed, and, suffer us to add, the partial statements of the late action on Lake Erie, and, induced by motives of the warmest admiration and greatest respect for our commander, Captain J. D.

Elliott, we take the liberty of laying before you our combined observations on the above late action; and knowing, as we do, your power of discrimination and impartiality of judgment, we commit it to you with full confidence of its universal evidence and consideration." The letter concludes with the assurance, "we have endeavoured, sir, to give you a succinct and minute account of the action from the commencement to the close."*** And yet, will the reader believe it, not one word is said in this "succinct and minute account of the action from the commencement to the close," embracing the "combined observations" of these commissioned officers, of the Niagara's bearing down after Perry took command of her, and breaking the enemy's line. Not one word is said by them of the Niagara taking any part in the battle from the moment Captain Elliott left her, while from that same moment the interest of the battle, so far as it fell under their "combined observations," followed his person, and they describe him as bearing off the victory, by his prowess, in the following words; "The Lawrence, some time previous to this, had dropped astern, much shattered and useless. Captain Perry left her and came on board the Niagara; he observed to Captain Elliott that he apprehended that the action was lost, who, with the spirit and promptitude we have been accustomed to see him exert, replied, 'No, sir, I will yet try and save the day:' he accordingly repaired on board, and taking the direction of one of the small vessels, brought the whole of them into action at close musket shot: the consequence was, that in ten minutes the Detroit and Queen Charlotte struck to us, and soon after the whole of the enemy's squadron followed their example." So the victory on Lake Erie was the consequence of Captain Elliott's going on board of one of the four small vessels at the rear of the American line, and which were coming rapidly up, and had nothing to do with the Niagara's breaking the enemy's line and raking them from both broadsides within pistol shot.

So, again, with Mr. Magrath's testimony. He, too, gave an account of the battle of Lake Erie, portions of which Mr. Cooper introduces with the following eulogy: "But Mr. Magrath was probably the best witness of which the case admitted. He was a seaman, stood by Captain Elliott's side, and gives his testimony like a man of sense, with distinctness and moderation." Will the reader believe, after this, that Mr. Magrath also ascribes the victory solely to Captain

Elliott, in the following terms? "Captain Elliott's volunteering to bring into close action all our small vessels, which was nobly and heroically executed, aided by the exertions of their commanders, produced the brilliant victory which warms with just pride the bosom of every American." Here, no more than in the letter, containing the "combined observations" of the commissioned officers of the Niagara, of whom Mr. Magrath was one, do we find any mention of the Niagara breaking the enemy's line: on the contrary, the victory was produced, according to Mr. Magrath, by Captain Elliott's bringing up the small vessels. Yet Mr. Cooper says, "I look upon Mr. Magrath's as the true version of the battle." I differ from Mr. Cooper altogether. Mr. Cooper, indeed, differs not a little from himself. Even he does not attempt with these witnesses, whom he eulogizes, to smuggle out of view the important fact of the Niagara's breaking the line. So, also, with regard to the testimony of Dr. Barton, which Mr. Cooper condemns me for not giving heed to, under the head of "he constantly contradicts the best evidence the case allows, on altogether insufficient grounds." He quotes Dr. Barton as testifying as follows; "The number of wounded on board the Niagara has been falsely estimated at twenty, and it has been stated that only one or two were wounded previous to Captain Perry's going on board. The exact number, including the dangerously or severely wounded, was twenty-seven, and the slight cases not reported must have amounted to six or eight more. Five were killed during the action, and a few died soon after: one man was mortally wounded on the berth-deck, very early in the contest, by a shot, which passed through both sides of the vessel." Mr. Cooper praises Dr. Barton's testimony in his pamphlet without stint. He says of him, "As respects the wounded, he was the best evidence of which the case admitted." Again, "He is evidently a man who states with proper caution, and one who wishes to say no more than the occasion called for." In the appendix to his pamphlet he recurs to this evidence of Dr. Barton with inveterate wrongheadedness. "Two accounts," he says, "of the loss of the Niagara have been given: that of the official report, and that of her own surgeon. On the part of Commodore Elliott, it is affirmed that the returns on which Perry report were given in by Dr. Parsons, and that he endeavoured to lessen the loss of this brig, under the influence of the feeling he so early manifested. Dr. Barton affirms that five men were killed, whereas the official reports puts this number at two. The following circumstances render it probable that Dr. Barton was right. This gentleman speaks of a man who was mortally wounded in a hammock before his own eyes. Add this man to the two sworn to by Mr. Webster, and we get more than all contained in the official report. Dr. Barton, moreover, the permanent medical officer of the Niagara, would be more apt to get the facts from a scattered crew, in the long run, than Dr. Parsons, whose account, even supposing him uninfluenced by feeling, as he clearly was not by his own showing, was made out in time for a report written three days after the action."

Here is a distinct allegation that Dr. Parsons made the return of the killed and wounded on board the Niagara, and that, under the influence of a partial feeling, he fraudulently departed from the truth in order to disparage Captain Elliott. Fortunately, the means of vindicating this high-minded gentleman from so atrocious a calumny are at hand. On what authority does the reader suppose that the return of killed and wounded, accompanying Commodore Perry's official report, and containing the name and rank of every individual killed or wounded in the squadron, was founded, so far as the Niagara was concerned? was it on a return drawn up and signed by the partial Dr. Parsons? No. It is a verbatim copy of the original return from the Niagara, now in my possession, and signed H. Magrath, purser, and Jesse D. Elliott, commandant, of whom Mr. Cooper says, " On the part of Commodore Elliott, it is affirmed that the returns on which Perry reported were given in by Dr. Parsons."

Yet Mr. Cooper considers Dr. Barton's testimony " the best of which the case admitted," though he was sick at the time, made no returns, and gave his reminiscences many years after. Mr Cooper elaborately substantiates Dr. Barton's evidence by a calculation founded on the evidence of Mr. Webster, and condemns me for rejecting all this and other similar evidence from the same sources, which he conceives the best, in order to follow what he deems of inferior credibility. I differ from Mr. Cooper on this subject as widely as I do as to the relative merits of Perry and Elliott in the battle of Lake Erie. The prejudiced and erroneous character of the testimony brought forward by Mr. Cooper, so glaringly exhibited in the above instance, and in others which I have pointed out, furnished reason enough why I should disregard it for the clear and consistent evidence on which I have founded my account of the battle of Lake Erie. Mr. Cooper might have seen the transactions in the same light that I have done, in common with the world generally, had he been uninfluenced by the inveterate love of paradoxes, or by other notions known only to himself.

If he is not misrepresented, the period is not yet very remote when he was as decided and declamatory in the denunciation of Elliott as he is now in his praise. After all, I do not find that these favourite witnesses of his controvert the most essential facts contained in my statement. They do not deny that the Niagara was within hail of the Lawrence when the battle commenced. They do not deny that the Niagara did not make all sail when the Lawrence did, and did not accompany her in closing with the enemy. They do not deny that the Niagara did not, throughout the action, engage at close quarters her designated antagonist, the Queen Charlotte. They do not deny that the Queen Charlotte, finding she could not engage the Niagara, passed ahead of the Hunter, in the British line, and united her fire with that of the Detroit upon the Lawrence. They do not deny that the Niagara was under topsails only, and had occasionally her main-topsail to the mast, and her jib brailed up, while the Lawrence was bearing down for the enemy under a press of sail. They do not deny that the Niagara had the Lawrence and Caledonia, during part of the action, between her and the enemy. They do not deny that the Lawrence had been reduced to a wreck, while the Niagara had received, two and a half hours after the commencement of the action, but trifling injury. They do not deny that, when Perry got on board the Niagara, he immediately hove to, then bore up, altering his course a whole right angle to close with the enemy. How, then, have I dealt unfairly in not using testimony which, though laudatory of Captain Elliott, does not impugn a series of consistent and irresistible facts testified to by the unimpeached evidence of officers as honourable and honoured as any in the navy?

But how does Mr. Cooper himself deal with the unimpeached and unimpeachable evidence I have named? Adopting a reproach, which he has at second-hand from Captain Elliott's biography, he thus attempts to reason down the testimony of the gallant officers of the Lawrence: "Although the Americans actually captured every English vessel engaged against them, their own commanding ship struck her colours. This circumstance naturally gave rise to some feeling, and it is in proof that certain of the officers of this vessel were early engaged in looking up evidence to criminate Captain Elliott, to whose conduct they ascribed their own disaster." And again, "The Lawrence, after suffering very severely, struck; and this in a battle in which all the enemy were subsequently captured, and the Lawrence herself retaken. Whatever may have been the gallantry of her crew, and the circumstances which led to such a result, the tenth September, as regards the Lawrence, was a defeat. It is easy to see that men so circumstanced might not be rigidly just." Now, no one but Captain Elliott's biographer, and Mr. Cooper endorsing his opinions—formost of what Mr. Cooper now brings forward has not even the merit of originality, and may be found in that unique production, which Mr. Cooper pronounces "fairer in spirit, more logical, and every way more respectable than" the Life of Perry—ever conceived the idea that the officers of the Lawrence had any occasion for self-reproach or mortification in connexion with the battle of Lake Erie. The Lawrence had borne the brunt of the engagement, had encountered her own antagonist, the Detroit, and the Queen Charlotte, the designated antagonist of the Niagara. Out of one hundred well officers and men who had gone into action, twenty-two were killed and sixty-one wounded. Every gun was disabled, the last serviceable one having only been loaded and discharged by the personal assistance of Perry himself, aided by his purser and chaplain. Perry had left the Lawrence to assume the command of the Niagara, and had got on board of her, and was bringing her into action. The Lawrence being thus entirely incapable of resistance, her colours were struck to spare the needless slaughter of the wounded officers and men. The Lawrence had suffered most, had been the most closely engaged, had contributed most essentially to the victory; what occasion had her officers to feel jealous of those of the Niagara, who had only been closely engaged at the close of the battle under the command of Perry? They might have felt irritation at her keeping so long out of action, shame at her abandonment of her consort to the added attack of her own designated antagonist, resentment at the needless sacrifice of so many of their shipmates, but no jealousy.

On account of this jealousy of his own and Captain Elliott's imagining, Mr. Cooper attempts to reason down the testimony of the officers of the Lawrence, and, still farther to disparage them, gets rid of two officers, next in rank on board of her to Perry, in the following summary manner: "Mr. Forrest, I understand, was a man of very feeble capacity, as was Mr. Yarnall, the other lieutenant of the Lawrence, and it may be some excuse for him, that he did not thoroughly comprehend what he was about."

After a somewhat similar process, he next gets rid of other gentlemen of the highest respectability: "Messrs. Parsons, Breese, Taylor, Champlin, and Brownell, all appear to have been natives of Rhode Island, and to have accompanied Perry when he left that state; and Mr. Turner, though a native of New-York, had been a resident of Rhode Island from childhood, and was almost identified with the family of Perry by long and intimate association." All these gentlemen, guilty of being born in Rhode Island, and Mr. Turner, guilty only of the inferior offence of residence and intimacy with Perry's family, are disparaged as witnesses by Mr. Cooper. Some persons might think that the respect, confidence, and enthusiastic attachment with which Perry inspired all who were closely associated with him, was an additional pledge as well of his worth as of theirs. Even admitting, however, that there is any validity in Mr. Cooper's charge of jealousy against the officers of the Lawrence, however absurd on the face of it, and equally setting aside their testimony and that of the officers of the Niagara, and referring the question to the decision of the commanders of the other American vessels, we find them corroborating, with singular unanimity and coincidence, the account which I have given of the battle of Lake Erie.

What, then, is the amount, what the provocation, and what the object of Mr. Cooper's scurrilous attack upon me? The amount of it is, that he heaps mountains of abuse upon me under the head of charges, which he attempts to substantiate, by pointing out, in two volumes consisting of nearly six hundred pages, one error of fact which I have accounted for, and will cheerfully correct, and another alteration from the existing testimony made on the faith of careful nautical computation, and which alteration of distance deprived me of an additional argument against Captain Elliott, though Mr. Cooper vaguely intimates that the alteration was made for the purpose of injuring him; charging me with alleged use of the worst evidence the case affords in preference to the best, according to Mr. Cooper's apprehension of what is the worst and what the best, of which it is only necessary to say that it is as heterodoxical and decidedly opposed to prevailing opinions as most of this gentleman's apprehensions are. Such is the amount of Mr. Cooper's accusations; such is the slender basis on which he has erected a superstructure of vulgar vituperation, extending through the greater part of more than a hundred pages.

As to the provocation I have given Mr. Cooper, I know not in what it consists, unless it be that, while Mr. Cooper, in three years of eager research, has only been able to detect one error in my two volumes of the Life of Perry, I casually discovered and pointed out, within the compass of a few pages of the Naval History, near a dozen palpable misstatements, many of which were against Perry, and not one of them in his favour. The following are the misstatements in question, which are here introduced to show in what manner the Naval History of Mr. Cooper compares with my Life of Perry in point of accuracy, and how much of injustice as well as bad taste there was in his assault. Mr. Cooper says, p. 370, vol. ii. of his Naval History, "About this time, too, Captain Perry made an application to be relieved from the command on the upper lakes, complaining of the qualities of the crews of the vessels he commanded." It was wholly untrue that Perry offered to relinquish his command on account of the unsatisfactory quality of his crews; he earnestly requested to be relieved on the specific ground that he conceived himself insulted in an official letter he had received from his senior officer on the lakes. Though this charge of Mr. Cooper's was untrue, and the means were within his reach of discovering its untruth, and though it was eminently suited to disparage and injure Perry, still I did not, in correcting it, impute intentional falsehood to Mr. Cooper, or make it the occasion of insult to him. On page 182. vol. ii., Life of Perry, I corrected, in a collective form, in a note relating to men sent to Lake Erie, the following errors of Mr. Cooper: "Mr. Cooper says, page 359, vol. ii., Naval History, there were eleven officers and one hundred men. There were only eighty-nine men. On the previous page he says that Commodore Chauncey, soon after the third of July, felt himself strong enough to send one hundred and thirty men, with the necessary officers, to the upper lakes. There were eight officers and only one hundred and twenty-two men. Thus, in both instances, the number of men sent by Commodore Chauncey to Captain Perry is overstated by Mr. Cooper. Mr. Cooper misdates the appearance of the English squadron off the bar, and the sailing of ours. These events took place on the fifth and sixth of August respectively, instead of the fourth and fifth, as stated by him. He subsequently states that the American squadron sailed from Erie for Sandusky on the eighteenth of August, when it sailed on the twelfth. He stated previously that 'it was near the end of June' before Perry sailed from Buffalo for Erie with the five small vessels; whereas he sailed from Buffalo on the fourteenth, and arrived at Erie on the eighteenth of June. These errors are corrected, as dates are considered material in history."

So, in the reply I made in the Evening Post of the 7th April, 1841, to an article of Mr. Cooper's in that journal, putting the public on its guard against the inaccuracy and historical worthlessness of the Life of Perry until the appearance of his then forthcoming pamphlet, which was only destined to see the light some years after, because Mr. Cooper "bided his time," I thus took occasion to correct other inexcusably gross errors which I had noted at the time, but which I did not deem sufficiently material to the task in which I was engaged to correct. "Mr. Cooper states, on page 204, vol. ii., of his work, 'On the 23d September, the squadron conveyed a body of 1200 men to the vicinity of Malden, in Upper Canada, of which place they took possession; and on the 27th, Captain Perry ascended to Detroit in the Ariel,' and so on, with a consecutive account of the expedition which terminated in the battle of the Thames, fought, as inferrible from his account, by 1200 men. Now what are the facts of the case, easily deducible from any contemporary history or newspaper which Mr. Cooper would have taken the trouble to consult? The army of General Harrison, to the number of 4500, was all assembled at Bass Island by the 22d of September. On the following morning, the transportation of the whole army to the Middle Sister Island, excepting the sick and a guard for the baggage, was commenced, and completed on the 26th. On the 27th, instead of the 23d, as stated by Mr. Cooper, the army, consisting of not less than 3500 men, instead of only 1200, was landed at Malden. An erroneous opinion is a comparatively innocent thing; even bad logic may carry with it its own correction; but a palpable misstatement of material facts is a matter of greater moment."

Here, no more than in the Life of Perry, is there any charge against Mr. Cooper of wilful misrepresentation; here is no vulgar abuse. I detect ten misstatements in his Naval History within the compass of a few pages, casually and without diligent search, for one that he has detected in the whole Life of Perry, after an investigation of three years' duration. In detecting his ten or more misstatements, I treat him with decorum; even Mr. Cooper admits it when he says, "So far as I am concerned. Captain Mackenzie has respected appearances a little." Mr. Cooper fastens upon a single misstatement of mine, and overwhelms me with scurrility. Can it be that I owe this to the one misstatement of mine that he was able to detect, or to the ten or more that I had the hardihood to point out within a few pages of his Naval History? If he had had more truth and justice on his side, and I had had less, is it not possible that he might have been more decorous and more gentlemanlike?

The following passage from the preface of Mr. Coopers pamphlet may assist in the disentanglement of his motives: "For years the writer has submitted in comparative silence to a gross injustice in connexion with this matter, not from any want of confidence in the justice of his case, or any ability to defend himself, but because he 'bided his time,' knowing, when that should arrive, he had truth to fall back upon. He has seen his own work condemned, and, so far as the public authorities were concerned, excluded from the district school libraries, and all on account of its supposed frauds in relation to the battle of Lake Erie; while, on the other hand, he has heard Captain Mackenzie's biography of Perry lauded from one end of the Union to the other, and preferred to that place in the libraries mentioned, from which his own work has been excluded. The day of reckoning has come at length, and the judgment of men will infallibly follow."

Here, then, there is something specific. Mr. Cooper has had the moderation to submit, in comparative silence, for years to gross injustice, though he had truth to fall back upon, "because he bided his time;" he has seen his own work condemned, and excluded from school libraries on account of alleged frauds, while he has had to listen quietly and hear Captain Mackenzie's biography lauded from one end of the Union to the other; nay, worse and more difficult, hear it preferred to the libraries from which his own work had been excluded. This, truly, was aggravating; this was too much even for the amiability and generosity of Mr. Cooper.

The course of Mr. Cooper, in attempting to disparage Perry and elevate Elliott, is so unaccountable on the face of it, that it is not wonderful that we should find him defending himself beforehand from the imputation of improper incentive. "A great clamour," he says, "has thus been raised against Captain Elliott, under the influence of party feeling, and while one half of the nation has been made to immolate him without examination, the other has not shown a disposition to defend. I cannot see why others might not have detected the character of most of the evidence on which this has been done as well as myself" If Mr. Cooper cannot see why, it must remain inexplicable. Again, "What motive could I have for not joining in the cry against Commodore Elliott beyond a wish to tell the truth? Is it politics? When and where have I sought political favour? It has been well known to my friends that, for years and years, I have uniformly declared no probable inducement could tempt me to hold office under the people and government of this country." When Mr. Cooper asks us what motive he can have for advocating his paradoxes, he must answer his own questions. We can only know as much on these subjects as he may think proper to tell us.

The following information, communicated by Mr. Cooper himself, is certainly not suited to diminish the wonder occasioned by the extraordinary course he has adopted with regard to the battle of Lake Erie: "It is often urged to the writer, that most of the officers of the navy are of opinion against Commodore Elliott's conduct in the battle of Lake Erie. This is probably true; it certainly is among the writer's acquaintances. But what is an opinion worth, when the party is ignorant of facts?" Here, then, we find the navy as well as the country pronouncing itself with singular unanimity on one side, and Mr. Cooper alone on the other. But what is an opinion worth, quoth Mr. Cooper, to the American world, naval and civil, when you know nothing of the facts? Here, then, Mr. Cooper pretends to monopolize all the wisdom of the country on a subject which has been much agitated for many years: in another paragraph we may see him laying claim, with equal boldness, to all its honesty: "The truth is not to be concealed, a man is much safer among us by the

Is not this a dangerous doctrine from the mouth of a dogmatical public instructor, who uniformly disparages popular opinion, and professes to be in advance of his age? Is not the man who tramples on the old adage, that "honesty is the best policy," and puts forward the new dogma, that "a man is much safer among us by the frank avowal of a tolerably corrupt motive," in some danger of going astray? Mr. Cooper, after all, not merely the only wise man in the country, but also the only true, pure, upright, honest, and honourable one? If so, we fear that, with such dogmas, he also may become a castaway. His present undertaking shows him at least to be already "smit" with something else besides "the love of honourable deeds." Having traduced his own countrymen, and even countrywomen, and misrepresented and defamed Perry in order to elevate Elliott, he has, at length, gone so far in his pamphlet, as in one sense to liken this last to the father of his country, of whom he has the hardihood to say, that if he were similarly judged, it might be possible "to demonstrate that even Washington was a desperate adventurer, and a man without morals." To demonstrate this is now the only task left to add to the notoriety of Mr. Cooper.

Even Mr. Cooper's modesty, however, seems to indicate that some apology is due to public decency for his last outbreak of violence and vulgarity. Of the value as well as courtesy of his apology, let the public, to whom it is offered, judge: "This controversy was not of my seeking: for years have I rested under the imputations that these persons have brought against me, and I now strike a blow in behalf of truth, not from any deference to a public opinion that, in my judgment, has not honesty enough to feel much interest in the exposure of duplicity and artifice, but that my children may point to the facts with just pride that they had a father who dared to stem popular prejudice in order to write truth."

Never was the sacred name of truth more sacrilegiously taken in vain; and she will surely vindicate her violated name by the opposite of what Mr. Cooper anticipates. He will find himself as much mistaken with regard to the future as he has usually been with respect to the present and the past; and those who come after him will rather lament the melancholy hallucination under which he has laboured in this crowning effort towards reversing himself from that proud eminence in the estimation of his countrymen, upon which they would so readily have enthroned him. He will now be best remembered as the traducer of his country, the inveterate assailant of its best-founded pride, its pride of naval achievement: his most conspicuous title to unenviable renown will be founded on his attempt to assassinate the memory of Perry. There is, however, some consolation for the afflicted friends of Mr. Cooper. If he is madder now than when he wrote The Naval History; if his monomania has rapidly gained strength, he is yet not nearly so mad as when he believed in the celebrated conspiracy between the French government and certain editors of the United States to put him down on account of his irresistible advocacy of American liberty.

Since Mr. Cooper has so pointedly invited public attention to the investigation of his motives in putting forth his pamphlet, it is impossible not to remark its coincidence in one particular with his remarkable letter to his countrymen in 1834. In that letter, the investigation of the ever-memorable royal and editorial conspiracy was enlivened by a well-timed discussion of "the removal of the deposits." In the pamphlet he has contrived, with equal appropriateness and good taste, to enrich his pages with abundant allusions to the case of the Somers. The hook that was baited with the removal of the deposits caught no fish: it remains to be seen what will be the result of the "experiment to obtain capital" from the Somers case. If some worthy associates may have found this path a ready one to preferment, why should not Mr. Cooper bring his higher-priced wares to assure a market! He has "bided his time!" Let any one consider the coincidence of circumstances under which the first insolent announcement of his pamphlet was made, and observe how completely it calls up the image of the assassin lurking in ambush, and watching the moment to take his enemy unawares.

But Mr. Cooper gravely assures us, as if something very tempting had been already offered to him, "It has been well known to my friends that, for years and years, I have uniformly declared that no probable inducement could tempt me to hold office under the people or government of this country." But, then, in his remarkable epistle to his countrymen, which partakes of the nature of a valedictory, he very solemnly takes leave of his countrymen, and intimates to them that they shall hear from him no more. Since then, however, Mr. Cooper has inflicted on them Homeward Bound, Home as Found, the Monnekins, and The Naval History. And we now find him, after having disparaged his own country, with characteristic inconsistency and contentiousness, entering into controversies in newspapers and reviews to defend himself against foreigners who have used him as a witness against his native land. If his countrymen, with all their sensitiveness to foreign ridicule, could not be very deeply wounded by the efforts of one of their own number to show how far their manners, air, and style of living sunk beneath that standard of aristocratic elegance which he had formed for himself in Europe, there was yet one venerated object of national pride through which the country might be assailed, its pride of naval glory; there was one, of many venerated names, through which the whole nation might be calumniated, and that was Perry.

Having been thus tempted before to forego a publicly announced intention, in order to appear as the assailant of his country, might not Mr. Cooper once more absolve himself from his vow, should the opportunity offer of "holding office under the people or government of this country?" Might not an access of returning patriotism, uniting with a lively sense of his own exceeding fitness to serve his country, impel him to lay his scruples on its altar?

There seems, however, to be such an insufficient sense of Mr. Cooper's extraordinary merits entertained in every quarter, that he is likely to be as entirely neglected by the higher powers as he is by the public, so much so, as to be driven to seek, in the circulation of a popular magazine, and under the pretext, how upright let every one judge, of drawing a faithful portrait "of Perry's acts and character," the means of obtaining a hearing for his calumnies, and, at last, to be perhaps indebted even to the charity of this notice to rescue him from complete neglect.

Mackenzie's complaint about "novels" was the perhaps equivalent of complaints about "comic books" in the 1950s or "social media" today. The Spectator, which began publishing in the United Kingdom in 1828 and remains in print, is a popular magazine with a conservative bent offering commentary on contemporary (and historical) culture and politics. ### Chapter 2

1. Named for Revolutionary War general Nathanael Greene, the USS General Green had one of the shortest operational careers of the early U.S. Navy. Commissioned in June 1799, she operated under the command of the elder Perry in the Caribbean until 1801 when Thomas Jefferson's Peace Establishment Act greatly decreased the budget for the U.S. military. The Greene was placed "in ordinary" -- roughly what we would call "mothballs" today -- at the Washington Navy Yard in 1801 and shortly after had her masts removed. In 1814, when British troops were marching on Washington (see Chapter 6), the Secretary of the Navy ordered the Washington Navy Yard and its ships, including the General Greene, to be burned to prevent them from falling into the hands of the enemy. Although categorized as a "frigate," the Greene was less than half the weight and much more lightly armed than contemporary frigates like the Constitution and the Constellation which carried many more and much larger guns. For example, the Constitution, with its twenty-four-pounder long guns and its thirty-two-pounder carronades could throw a broadside of about 680 pounds, but the Greene had a broadside of just over 140 pounds. In contrast, the sloop-of-war USS Wasp, built in 1807, could throw fifty percent more iron than the Greene. -- Ed.

2. International relations regarding the French colony of Saint-Domingue (Haiti) were complicated to put it mildly. The US recognized François-Dominique Toussaint Louverture a former slave who had engaged in rebellion to overthrow slavery who now ruled the colony in the name of Napoleonic France. Louverture technically worked for France, but in reality Saint-Domingue was a semi-autonomous colony of France with which the U.S. and Britain wished to trade even as they wish to embargo France. So, the two countries signed secret treaties with Louverture to authorize trade and allow Louverture to issue letters-of-marque for French privateers, even as the U.S. Navy was seizing other French privateers. The U.S. and the U.K. also both supported Louverture in his war (the War of Knives in 1799-1800) against André Rigaud who opposed Louverture's authority.

Chapter 5

1. In order to discover them even so long as this before their possible arrival, he had constructed a watch-tower on the extremity of Rhode Island, where he kept a look-out party, which communicated by signals the appearance of any sail in the offing. He had asked authority of the navy department for the construction of this simple and cheap structure at the public expense; but, having received no answer, the town authorities of Newport, feeling the importance of such a look-out station, appropriated the trifling sum that was necessary, and it was completed by the mechanics of the flotilla, and kept by a small detachment from it.

Chapter 6

1. Mr. Noah Brown, the venerable builder of our fleet on Erie, after having contributed, by the construction of these and many other vessels of war, to the renown of our navy, and amassed, in the course of long years of prosperous industry, a handsome fortune, finds himself again, by the reverses so common in our country, sent back, in his old age, to the startingplace from which he set out, and may now be seen working as a journeyman in our ship-yards, with a manly cheerfulness and proud independence of disposition which places him above and beyond the reach of misfortune. More respected by the world he might have been in his days of prosperity, but never more respectable than now. To this venerable man the writer is indebted for interesting details as to the construction of the squadron on Erie.

2. Mr. Cooper says Perry did not leave Buffalo until the end of June.

3. Perry was apparently still unaware that the British had renamed Friend's Good Will as Little Belt. The sloop was an American merchant lake vessel that the British had captured in 1812 and named after the warship that the US had attacked in the "Little Belt Affair" of 1811.

4. Captain Elliott has caused to be inserted in the life of himself the following passage: "So fully impressed was he (Commodore Perry) with the belief that Captain Elliott was the very man for the purpose, that he wrote to Commodore Chauncey, 'Send me Captain Elliott and one hundred men, and I will engage to beat the British.'" No such passage as this exists in the original letter-book of Perry's

Lake Erie command, in which all his letters to Commodore Chauncey, official and semiofficial, are carefully copied. Captain Elliott was then only a lieutenant, and is written of by Perry as Lieutenant Elliott several weeks later than the date of this letter. Instead of "Send me Captain Elliott and one hundred men, and I will engage to beat the British," which is so unlike Perry's mode of expressing himself, we find only in his correspondence, "Woolsey, Brown, or Elliott I should like to see amazingly."

5. In Mr. Hambleton's journal the following remark occurs on the twenty-seventh of July. "The first application for men was on the twentieth of May. Had they been furnished, we might have been out several weeks ago, and the necessity of again calling out the militia at this busy season would have been avoided. The command of the two lakes is too extensive for any one man."

Chapter 7

1. Mackenzie's chronology here is apparently confused. Barclay withdrew his fleet from the bar on July 31, not on August 2nd and hence "were still absent" on the 1st when Perry began working to get the brig Lawrence over the bar.

2. Perry was subsequently consulted by the navy department as to the practicability of deepening the bar of Erie, and gave his opinion in favour of it. The project has since been successfully effected by sinking piers on each side of the channel so as to narrow it ; and the action of the wind in driving in the water has, with the aid of a dredging machine, so far removed the sand-bar as to deepen the channel to nine feet. The government has, moreover, recently shown an enlightened sense of the value of this port, for commercial as well as for warlike purposes, by cutting through the tongue of the peninsula at the western extremity of the bay, so as to make a passage in that direction for vessels bound up the lake, which might otherwise remain wind-bound when the wind was fair to make their passage if without the harbour.

3. Deputy-commissary of ordnance of the northwestern army. He had been sent to Erie to receive some ordnance stores to be embarked in the squadron for the use of the army. While getting the vessels over the bar he commanded the battery on the beach.

4. The following is the list of the vessels and their commanders on this cruise: Lawrence, Captain Perry; Niagara, Lieutenant D. Turner; brig Caledonia, commanded by Purser H. Magrath; pilot-boat schooner Ariel, Lieutenant L. Packett; schooners Scorpion, Sailing-master S. Champlain; Somers, Sailing-master Almy; Tigress, Master's Mate A. Macdonald; Porcupine, Midshipman George Senat. The Amelia, Ohio, and Trippe were left behind for want of crews.

5. Mr. Cooper says, p. 359, there were eleven officers and one hundred men. There were only eighty-nine men. On the previous page he says, that Commodore Chauncey, soon after the third of July, felt himself strong enough to send one hundred and thirty men, with the necessary officers, to the upper lakes. There were eight officers and only one hundred and twenty-two men. Thus, in both instances, the number of men sent by Commodore Chauncey to Captain Perry is overstated by Mr. Cooper. Mr. Cooper misdates the appearance of the English squadron off the bar and the sailing of ours. These events took place on the fifth and sixth of August respectively, instead of the fourth and fifth, as stated by him. He subsequently states that the American squadron sailed from Erie for Sandusky on the eighteenth of August, when it sailed on the twelfth. He states previously that "it was near the end of June" before Perry sailed from Buffalo for Erie with the five small vessels, whereas he sailed from Buffalo on the fourteenth, and arrived at Erie on the eighteenth of June. These errors are corrected, as dates are considered material in history.

6. Yet we find Mr. Cooper, whose sympathy perpetually overflows for the commodore, lamenting that "this draught greatly deranged the crew of the Pike, her men requiring to be stationed anew after it had been made." The only difficulty in stationing them would be to keep them out of each other's way.

7. He had since heard of the arrival of Commodore Barclay with a re-enforcement of officers and men, and of the launching of the heavy ship Detroit, which, when fitted for service, would give the enemy a decided superiority. His great anxiety had been to get out before the equipment of that ship.

8. "Financial agency" -- Mackenzie here is pointing out that Perry, unlike many of his contemporary Navy officers, refused to seek any profit in managing the shipyard and ship building to which he was otherwise entitled. It seems strange to us today, but in the early 19th century, such income was expected.

9. Mr. Magrath had originally been a sea-officer in the navy senior to Perry. He had resigned, as an old lieutenant, in 1809.

Chapter 8

1. That we have not overstated the British force will be seen from the following. Prisoners taken in battle and landed at Camp Portage, as by the official list, containing their names and rank, 308; killed and wounded in the battle by the British account, which we will assume to be correct, though we believe it to be underrated, and that, in the confusion of capture, and death of commanders and seconds in command, every person thrown overboard was duly accounted for, 135; provincial officers known to have been paroled by Commodore Perry, on account of having families at Malden, 3 certainly; medical officers detained on board the Detroit and Queen Charlotte to cure their sick and wounded, 3; sea or army lieutenant paroled by Perry, and sent to Erie in the Lawrence after the action to confer with the British commissary of prisoners, 1; making altogether 450; which, with 52 which we will suppose unaccounted for and left with the wounded to go to Erie as too ill for a march of several hundred miles, will make 502. We thus, at any rate, know certainly that there were 450 men in health on board the British squadron when it went into action. Our numbers by the muster-roll amounted to 490, of which 116 were sick on the morning of the action. Say that 16 of these sick Americans came on deck and took part in the battle, it would leave us with but 390 to 450 of the British. Yet James, in his British Naval History, tells us, p. 250, vol. 6, "By adding 80 Canadians and 240 soldiers from the Newfoundland and 41st regiments to the 50 British seamen, the crew of Commodore Barclay's squadron is made to amount to 345." It should be observed, that he had previously stated that Captain Barclay himself brought with him 19 seamen, and had mentioned the arrival of the draught from the Dover, known to amount to 50 seamen. Before the arrival of Barclay, and before the building of the Detroit, the rest of the squadron, mounting 44 guns, was cruising under Captain Finnis. Will any one believe that these vessels, mounting 44 guns, were only manned by 80 Canadians, even if the finding of the court-martial did not enable us to ascertain the contrary? It must be remembered that Mr. James is aided by a captain in the royal navy, who, as such, is supposed to be a mathematician, and yet endorses the arithmetic of Mr. James. In the Edinburgh Review of 1840, this arithmetic is again endorsed by a Scotchman, also probably a naval captain, who reproduces the figures and draws arguments from them without stopping to correct them. If the error had been the other way, we should have no right to complain. As it is, we think the passage worthy of correction, or the misstatement of being made more congruous. Another gross delusion practised by the historian and endorsed by the reviewer, who claims for it Mr. Cooper's sanction because he has not contradicted it, is in assigning to our squadron a great superiority of metal, because the weight of shot thrown by our ships at a broadside was greatly superior to theirs. This superiority grew out of the fact of their having no fewer than 35 long guns, while we had only 15. Now the weight of long guns is to carronades of equal calibre more than in the proportion of three to one. How, then, could they hope to exceed us as 35 to 15 in number of long guns, and yet equal us in weight of shot at a broadside? These naval gentlemen must have known full well that the advantage was on their side while making their misstatements. They also knew that the circumstances under which the battle was fought gave to the British the full benefit of their substitution of length of gun for calibre.

2. Here of course, Mackenzie overstates the power of the English fleet compared to that of Perry's by highlighting that Barclay's squadron had 63 guns to Perry's 54. This is not surprising as Mackenzie was writing long before Theodore Roosevelt's work Naval War of 1812 had effectively proved that it was Perry who had the advantage over the Barclay. Roosevelt looked at the weight of the shot which each squadron could throw at their enemy rather than simply the number of barrels the ships possessed. He concluded that the British broadsides amounted to 459 pounds to the American broadsides of nearly 900. Either the Lawrence or the Niagara could each nearly match both the two biggest British ships by themselves. But we could perhaps forgive Mackenzie for overlooking this key detail; he wishes to emphasize the role of Perry's coolness and leadership in the American victory, and this is certainly not to be underestimated. Perry understood the power each of his two flagships possessed, and his decision to transfer his flag and his utter fearlessness in doing so allowed him to bring that advantage to bear. See: Chapter 6 of Theodore Roosevelt, The Naval War of 1812, 1882.

3. Mr. Cooper and Mr. Burgess say nine miles. This cannot be correct. Our squadron was sailing at the rate of two, or, at the most, two and a half or three knots; and the action began at a quarter before twelve, at the distance of a mile and a half. The British squadron, though hove to, must have had a headway and drift together of half a knot.

4. What would he have given at this moment for all the "Newport boys" who had accompanied him to Ontario, and more than half of whom had been detained there; those "Newport boys" of whom he had written to the secretary, when offering his services for the lakes, "There are fifty or sixty men under my command that are remarkably active and strong, capable of performing any service. In the hope that I should have the honour of commanding them whenever they should meet the enemy, I have taken unwearied pains in preparing them for such an event, I beg, therefore, sir, that we may be employed in some way in which we can be serviceable to our country."

5. The enemy had a pivot-gun in each of the large vessels as well as the small.

6. The above account of the interview between Captain Perry and Captain Elliott is taken from Mr. Hambleton's journal, as related to him by Perry on the evening of the battle. The reader will see in the sequel how differently the interview is described by Captain Elliott. Perry also told Mr. Hambleton in the evening that he "found the Niagara in perfect fighting order, uninjured in her hull or crew. 'From that moment,' said he, 'I was confident of victory.'"

7. This is mistaken. Perry in the Niagara was passing under the stern of the Detroit and the bow of the Queen Charlotte which permitted him to rake both vessels.

8. Again, Mackenzie is trying to turn Perry's skillful victory into a kind of miracle of David vs. Goliath, when, as historians have repeated highlighted, it was Perry's squadron that was superior.

Mackenzie also doesn't mention that the wind died down just as the battle was joined ensuring that Elliot in the Niagara would not be able to come up. A 1911 history of the United States Navy sums up the two sides nicely: "The forces opposed in the battle were very unequal. The Americans had nine vessels' with a total broadside of 896 pounds against Barclay's six vessels and total broadside of 459 pounds. Perry's superiority in long gun metal was as three is to two, and in carronade metal as two is to one. Barclay's gunnery was excellent in spite of the fact that, having no locks, he had to fire his guns by flashing pistols at the touch-holes. The total American crew numbered 532, of whom only 416 were fit for duty; the British crew amounted to 440. In all this comparison, however, it must be borne in mind that the Americans were not able to take advantage of their superiority in ships and equipment until nearly the end of the action, when Elliott finally brought up the Niagara." (Clark, 1911, 171.)

Chapter IX

1. Yet Captain Elliott subsequently procured from this officer, whom he had thus endeavoured to destroy, a commendatory certificate, and made him instrumental in publishing it. To the remark of Mr. Cooper, "It is now believed that the omission of the names of the commanders of the gun vessels astern was accidental," Mr. Hambleton appends the following note: "It was not. They were omitted in consequence of the unfavourable report of Captain Elliott, who said they were not making the best of their way up." The name of Mr. Hambleton, whose conduct throughout the battle was so gallant and meritorious, is omitted by Mr. Cooper among the list of wounded officers.

2. See affidavits at the end of the work in the Appendix.

3. Captain Elliott subsequently procured from this gentleman a favourable certificate.

4. See, in the sequel, Perry's letter of the 18th June, 1818. *** need to find the link***

5. In reference to this letter, Captain Perry, long after, wrote Captain Elliott:

"Your letter to me, of which you once furnished a false copy for publication, and which you now represent as making a demand upon me, was merely an introduction to mine."

That the reader may discover the truth of the charge, the letter subsequently published by Captain Elliott at Erie, and quite recently reproduced in his autobiography, if that title can be given to a work written under his auspices and containing his opinions, is subjoined.

"Sir,

"I am informed a report has been circulated by some malicious persons, prejudicial to my vessel when engaged with the enemy's fleet. I will thank you if you will, with candour, state to me the conduct of myself, officers, and crew.

obedient servant,

"Respectfully, your

"Jesse

D. Elliott.

"Captain Perry."

On a comparison of the real, original letter written by Captain Elliott, as given in the text, with this letter, published in the Erie Sentinel a month and a half afterward, and reproduced in the Life of Commodore Elliott, the reader will perceive that the whole tone of the letter is changed, from an urgent friendly appeal to a peremptory demand. The "Dear Sir" is reduced to plain "Sir;" and, to make the contrast stronger, Commodore Perry is made to begin with a "My dear Sir," instead of with the same conventional expression of friendly intercourse used by Captain Elliott. The effect of these changes is to give an exacting tone to the letter of Captain Elliott, and a decidedly deprecating one to that of Commodore Perry. The letter, which was the offspring of an ill-judged and ill-requited benevolence, is made to assume the guise of an extorted concession. Some other alterations were also made in Commodore Perry's letter, to give greater force to his expressions, but of little importance when compared with those made in Captain Elliott's own prefatory note. It was desirable to keep out of view the important fact that reports unfavourable to the conduct of Captain Elliott in the battle of the tenth of September were already in extensive circulation; hence the motive for changing the introduction of the letter, from "My brother, who has this evening arrived from the interior of the country, has mentioned to me a report that appeared to be in general circulation," to "I am informed a report has been circulated by some malicious persons." This substantiation of the charge against Captain Elliott of furnishing "a false copy for publication" of an important letter, will simplify the after discussion of the difficulties between these two officers, and assist the reader in the intelligence of their respective claims to honourable consideration.

6. Because of course.--Ed.

7. This admission of Captain Elliott is substantially readmitted in his biography, page 57.

8. Biographical Notice of Commodore J. D. Elliott, page 184.

CHAPTER X

1. After such objections to the official report, and such efforts to procure it to be made more favourable to him, it is singular to find Captain Elliott, before the court of inquiry into his conduct in 1815, when the British official account and the sentence of the court-martial on Commodore Barclay had made him appear so much more disadvantageously, strenuously endeavouring to substantiate this very report, and making a question as to its accuracy a leading one to almost every witness. Still more remarkable is it to find him, when called upon by Lieutenant Holdup Stevens to furnish the grounds upon which he, Captain Elliott, had made to Commodore Perry assertions derogatory to Mr. Stevens's character, which alone

Commodore Perry had informed Mr. Stevens had led to his not being mentioned in the official report, virtually disclaiming all cognizance of the making out of that report, and expressing astonishment at Perry's idea of "information said to have been received from his second in command, who, from the particular nature of the official despatch, had not, and could not have, any agency in making out the report of that action, or in communicating anything that led to it."

2. It had been expected that this letter would be published by the secretary. This expectation having been disappointed, the letter, with scarcely any variation of language, was turned into a friendly one from Lieutenant J. E. Smith, of the Niagara, to a person in Baltimore, and published in that city. The reader will see in the sequel how Captain Elliott had spoken of this gentleman.

3. See the finding of the court-martial on Commodore J. D. Elliott, held in Philadelphia in 1840.

4. Captain Elliott, in a more recent version of this conversation in his Biography, adds the remark, "My ship is now in a judicious position." Captain Elliott's pretension of having placed his "ship in a judicious position," even had he ever before uttered the remark, from which Mr. Cooper gets his idea of Captain Elliott having given the squadron "a very commanding position," have neither of them the least foundation in naval tactics or in common sense. The most "judicious position" which the Niagara could have had, either for breaking the line or taking her due share in the battle, was the position assigned to her alongside the Queen Charlotte, and at close quarters; a position which, be it understood, as involving the whole substance of the question, she never occupied. From that position she could have broken the line astern of the Queen Charlotte and Detroit, and, raking them through their sterns far more destructively than through their bows, have luffed up on the same tack, instead of finding herself, as she did, from the position in which she broke through ahead on the contrary tack, less conveniently situated for engaging. Again, the "judicious position" of Captain Elliott, and the "very commanding position" of Mr. Cooper, what were they? The Niagara, when boarded by Perry, had got opposite the head of the British line. When Perry bore down to break that line, the British squadron attempted to wear, and the two principal ships getting foul alone prevented them from completing the evolution. Had it been completed, and the chances were ten to one that it would be, the Niagara would have been at the rear instead of at the head of the British line, and Captain Elliott's "judicious position" and Mr. Cooper's "very commanding position" would have been reversed. In this case, the tactics of these gentlemen, to be consistent, would have led them to run to the other extremity of the line, now become the head, in order to recover their judicious and commanding position. Such is the absurdity in which these two gentlemen are involved. Captain Elliott by endeavouring to extricate himself from the hopeless perplexities of his position, Mr. Cooper without probably being aware of it, and betrayed by his partiality.

5. It will be seen in the sequel that this was not the case.

6. Captain Elliott thought it unreasonable in Mr. Champlin to decline giving a certificate to him about the position of the Niagara, because he was at the head of the line, and had three vessels between him and the Niagara. Mr. Brownell, who was in the Ariel, one vessel nearer, testified unfavourably to Captain Elliott's conduct. At page 62 of Captain Elliott's Biography is an attempt to invalidate Mr. Brownell's evidence on account of his position, when Mr. Champlin, being farther off, was punished for not testifying.

CHAPTER XI

1. While American fears of scalping and attacks on civilians was certainly not without basis, Tecumseh explicitly prohibited such attacks and policed his warriors even going so far as to chastise his allies, the British, for their brutalities.--Ed.

2. The orders to generally not take prizes is an interesting one. As the reader saw with the disposition of the British ships taken on Lake Erie, officers and crew alike were rewarded when prizes were sold on an established scale of shares. This reward acted as a motivator for crewmen, so the orders to "burn, sink, or destroy" might have lessened the enthusiasm for service on these ships if the orders were known to possible recruits. But given the distance from the United States and any friendly port to which to send prizes in the Mediterranean, the orders make sense. Each vessel taken on which a prize crew was placed would lessen the number of men available to fight Perry's ships, and the almost-overwhelming presence of the Royal Navy in the Mediterranean would vastly increase the chances of such prizes being recaptured, of course, the resulting loss of irreplaceable crewmen.--Ed.

3. This is a reference to the attacks made on American coastal towns by the Royal Navy, particularly the raids in the which plagued the settlements around the Chesapeake Bay. Here, the U.S. Navy wished to avoid engaging in such immoral raids of the enemy's homeland despite the possible desire for vengeance American sailors might feel.--Ed.

CHAPTER XII

1. "Sloop" here is a misnomer although both could be considered sloops-of-war. The Ontario was a ship-rigged vessel (having 3 masts) and 16 guns while the Epervier was a captured British brig (2-masted) also of 16 guns.--Ed.

2. This same feeling was conspicuous in the character of his brother Alexander, and occasioned his premature death. No doubt the reader will recall that young James Alexander Perry served alongside his elder brother during the Battle of Lake Erie. Alexander went on to an all-too-brief period of service as an officer in the U.S. Navy which was cut short when he died in 1822 in Valparaiso, Chile trying to rescue a fellow officer who was drowning.--Ed.

3. The writer has seen the advantage of always having stern-ladders overboard in port and at sea. On a recent cruise, the look-out in the fore-topmast cross-trees most unaccountably fell overboard while blowing fresh. The ship, being by the wind, was hove to, with her courses hauled up, by the time the man reached her counter; and an active boatswain's mate, descending by the stern-ladder, grasped the man securely and assisted him in reaching the poop.

4. The USS Washington was only the second ship-of-the-line to be commissioned into U.S. Navy service. It operated only for a few years after its launching in 1815 before being broken up in 1823.--Ed.

5. The following is a specimen, dated Mahon, March 11, 1816 :

"Sir,

"The mortifying situation in which I am placed, by conduct highly improper in an officer and a gentleman, I sensibly feel. I am aware of your indulgence in your determination; but I cherish the hope you are willing to believe that the unpleasant occurrence resulted more from the effect of accident than design, and that you will again evince your confidence by placing me on the same footing with my mess-mates. I have the honour to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"John Heath, Capt. Com. Marines."

6. The exception was Commander M. C. Perry, on board the Concord. Those who were in the Mediterranean in 1831 will admit the superior attention paid to these particulars, and the success with which it was attended.

Letter from the Officers on board the Niagara, to the Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. Sloop Niagara, 13th of Oct. at anchor off Detroit, U. C.

Respected Sir—We have with regret seen the condensed, and suffer us to add, partial statements of the late action on Lake Erie, and induced by motives of the warmest admiration for our commander, Captain Elliott, we take the liberty of laying before you our combined observations on the above late action—and knowing as we do, your power of discrimination and impartiality of judgment, we commit it to you, with full confidence of its universal evidence and consideration.

On the 10th of September, 1813, while lying in Put-in Bay, the enemy's fleet was discovered from the Lawrence's mast head. At 5 A.M. signal 1205. Our squadron weighed, and commenced beating out of the bay, in company the Lawrence, Capt. Perry, the Niagara, Capt. Elliott, the Caledonia, Ariel, Scorpion, Somers, Porcupine, Tigress, and Trippe. At 6 A.M. discovered the sails in the western board to be the enemy's squadron, consisting of two ships, two brigs, one schooner, one sloop, with their larboard tacks on board, standing to the southward under easy sail, our squadron using all possible exertion to join them by beating out of the bay, the wind continued from southward and westward; when out of the bay, kept our wind upon the larboard tack, in order to preserve the weather guage, which was affected—observed the enemy's squadron to form in line of battle ahead, in the following order: —the Detroit leading the van, brig Hunter, Queen Charlotte, Lady Prevost, Chippewa, and Little Belt. Our squadron forming in line of battle in the following order: Schooner Ariel of four, and Scorpion of two guns, on the Lawrence's weather bow, the Lawrence, Capt. Perry, leading the van; the Caledonia, the Niagara, the Porcupine, the Somers, the Tigress & Trippe. At a quarter before 12, the enemy's ship Detroit commenced firing on our headmost vessel, distance computed at one mile and an half. At meridian the action became general and closer, the whole of the enemy's fire being directed at the Lawrence, Caledonia, and Niagara. The Lawrence labored under a very great disadvantage at this time; observing her shot to fall short of the Detroit, who having long guns, placed her shot in the Lawrence deliberately and at discretion. This, in our opinion, is one reason why the Lawrence, became so much shattered. The Niagara's position was close astern of the Caledonia, which she maintained, and being a little abaft the weather beam of the Queen Charlotte, abreast the Lady Prevost and rest of the enemy's squadron, the whole of whose fire she sustained. At this time the Queen Charlotte was discovered to bear up and stand away from the Niagara's fire. Capt. Elliott ordered the fore and aft mainsail to be hauled, out and the jibsheet aft, in order to come up with her, she being the vessel we meant particularly to engage. The Queen Charlotte having gained the Detroit's lee and the Lawrence gaining ahead, Capt. Elliott order the Caledonia to bear up and leave us room to close with the Lawrence, which was done, and the action carried on with great spirit and vigor on both sides. The most [of] our fire was now directed against the Queen Charlotte, (she having regained the line) Lady Prevost and Little Belt. We now ranged ahead, receiving the combined fires of the Detroit, Queen Charlotte and Lady Prevost. The Lawrence some time previous to this had dropped astern much shattered and useless. Captain Perry left her and came on board the Niagara; he observed to Capt. Elliott, that he apprehended the action was lost; who, with that spirit and promptitude we have been accustomed to see him exert, replied No, sir, I will yet try and save the day; he accordingly repaired on board, and taking the direction of one of the small vessels brought the whole of them into action at close musket shot; the consequence was, that in ten minutes the Detroit and Queen Charlotte, with the Lady Prevost struck to us, and soon after the whole of the enemy's squadron followed their example. The Lawrence had some minutes before struck her colors and hauled out the line. You will perceive, sir, by this account, that the Niagara was most usefully and energetically engaged during the action, and the gallant manner, and the celerity with which the small vessels were brought into action, and the instant change effected by it, ranks Capt. Elliott, in our opinion, as second to none in the attainment of the late action. We are unwilling to quit the subject without expressing our estimation of our noble commander. We feel it is a duty to him, and to ourselves to express our opinion of his conduct during the action, which was manifested by his cool, brave and judicious deportment, and are firmly in opinion that his valor could not be surpassed by any; and that in him the American flag has a most zealous, skilful and heroic defender. We have here endeavored, sir, to give you a succinct and minute account from commencement to close. In doing this we have been actuated by unprejudiced love and respect for Capt. Elliott.

We have the honor to be, sir,

Your obedient serv'ts,

J. E. SMITH, Lieut.

H. MAGRATH, Purser.
